It is a comprehensive, yet great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances ARNANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved to make a Great Gift Appropriation, to be divided according to the following regulations:

Certificates of the various articles are placed in envelopes indiscriminately, sealed up, and, when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, the same day as favorlums. On receipt of the certificate you will see what you can have for one dollar, and it is then optional to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may have their choice of Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any Set of Jewelry on our list for ONE DOLLAR.

Send 25 cents for a Certificate.

In all transactions by mail we shall charge for forwarding the certificates, postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent. For example, if you send $1, it will be sent for $1; if you send $2, it will be sent for $2; sixty-five for $15; one hundred for $25.

What the "Press" say of us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, chains, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arnandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have an immense stock of valuable goods for sale, and all are offered at one dollar each. The distribution is very fairly done—you are to have a certificate of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay a dollar until you have seen and received the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, and may be worth $100. An excellent mode for the purpose of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, N. Y. City, Feb. 26, 1865.

Messrs. Arnandale & Co. have long been personally known to us as gentlemen fully to be relied on for the security of public confidence.—N. Y. Scottish American Journal, March 11, 1865.

We have inspected at the office of Arnandale & Co.'s Agency for Exposing and Introducing Jewelry, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewelry at the lowest possible rates. We also noticed a large quantity of silverware, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be sold at one dollar on a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents.—The Times (in addition to its usual correspondents and thoroughly worthy of public confidence), must recommend to our readers to read their advertisement.—N. Y. Albion, Sept. 3, 1864.

Mr. Arnandale, in addition to the arrangement the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has every article in his list to choose from unquestionably to have. We know what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he can send what he likes.—N. Y. Saturday Press, Aug. 6, 1864.

TO OUR COUNTRY LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable business ever offered to them to whom the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arnandale & Co. is a lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in this way, not only in filling her own purse, but also in giving pleasure to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen by our advertising columns.—Sunday Mercury, August 14, 1864.

In our columns to-day our readers will find an advertisement of Arnandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewelry, and silverware. A number of this establishment have received several sets of the jewelry advertised, and we are interested in saying that, as to finish and quality, they exceed our expectations. They turned out to be just what many of the gifts represented.—True American (Lancaster, Ohio), August 11, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., say, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arnandale & Co., and in a few days sold a number of certificates, sent as prizes for her agency, to the office for inspection, and without exception, every one stated that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the purchasers, and some of them six times.

We have seen some very pretty specimens of Table and Tea Spoons, Gold Watches, Ladies' Chains, Fine Bracelets, etc., which have been sent by Arnandale & Co. to this place for $1 each.—Appleton Reporter, N. Y. State, Feb. 15, 1865.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to ten Dollars. Send 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

ARCANA WATCH.

An Elegant Novelty in Watches.

The cases of this watch are an entirely new invention, composed of six different metals combined, rolled together and planished, producing an exact imitation of heavy gold, called Arcana, which will always keep its color. They are beautiful and durable as solid gold, and are afforded at one-eighth the cost. The case is beautifully decorated with a jeweled and chased shield for name, initial, monogram, and engraved in the exact style of the celebrated Gold Hunting Lever, and are nearly handsome and durable, and so exact an imitation of gold as to defy detection. The movement is manufactured by the well-known Swiss Watch Company of Europe, and are superbly finished, having jewel holes, compensation bent bridges, adjusting regulator, with gold balance, and the improved ruby pivot action, making a perfect time dial, and thereby, and to the eye, a perfect timekeeper. These watches are of three different sizes, the same for ladies, and are all stem winders and pinions. A case of a will be sent by mail or express for $125. A single case will be sent by express, C.O.D., for $50. Agents liberally solicited from all parts. We are the sole agents for this watch in the United States, and none are genuine which do not bear our trade-mark.

PINEAPPLE CIDER.

DR. TALBOT'S CONCENTRATED MEDICAL PINEAPPLE CIDER is a preventive of sickness.

The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last 25 years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's MEDICATED PINEAPPLE CIDER, designed for all classes.

Old and Young. It is not new to the Doctor, but it is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a family from seven a year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring: nevertheless it will Save Millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay $10 for a bottle of Cider and keep well, than to have to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills and as much more for nursing, and then be in danger of dying, and be sick? To prevent sickness, see as follows:

Add one teaspoonful of the Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you rise in the morning, and you will prevent Fevers and Sickness. It will increase the strength, and give

Vigor and Action to the whole system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, says Dr. Talbot, that he has gained ten pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues to use it as above directed, and finds it very beneficial: says it has proved an entire Cure for Dyspepsia. Also for sick headache. Also another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Pineapple Cider for Nervousness, Fever, and has not been sick one day during that time.

Those Who Desire Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and avoid being sick. Persons taken internally, for pains of the stomach—Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Cramp, Cholera Morbus, Inflammation of the Bowels, Neuralgia, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., will find immediate relief.

It imparts a cheerfulness to the disposition, and brilliancy to the complexion.

To travelers, especially, it is of inestimable value, and should be used in every family as a safe and sure guard which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency. Persons going to sea will find it a preventive of sea-sickness with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious restorative.

CHECK-MATE.

[SLIGHTLY ALTERED FROM REYNOLDS'S GAME OF LIFE.]

"IT is DAVIS, the Spirit of TREASON, playing with UNCLE SAM for his Life. The scene is chosen with a sort of mysterious reference to the whole idea that is to be expressed. The very architecture intimates the presence of that dark Being to whose sphere belongs all that is horrible, traitorous, and repulsive. It is a wide vault whose arch is formed by two lizard-shaped monsters, whose heads—half bird, half locust—as well as their short, misshapen claws, adhere closely to its two pillars, down which they seem to creep. The upper surface of a sarcophagus is transformed into a chess-board; and UNCLE SAM, the type of calm, self-possessed manhood, sits at this table, his countenance expressive of triumph tempered by amiability. Opposite to him, on the spectator's left hand, is DAVIS, the Prince of Rebellion, seated in a large chair, one of whose arms shows the British Lion in an orgasm of disappointed 'neutrality;' while, lower down, the claw of this lion grasping a human skull, intimates his protective government of Ireland. A broad cloak, from which only his bony, claw-like hands appear, is thrown around DAVIS, and his hair and his beard bristle with impotent rage. The expression of his features, as becomes his fallen state, is devilish and hateful. He who was a liar from the beginning, he who has played falsely, is undeniably before us, with all the rapacity of a Tiger and all the cruelty of a Hyena. Contumely, scorn, hatred, malice, rejoicing in mischief, find here their appropriate features; and the hand whose nails are being gnawed in baffled fury may either conceal a demoniacal grimace at the evident defeat of his schemes, or repress a horrid imprecation before which the gates of Hell would tremble, that deliverance is no longer possible. Between the two players, somewhat in the back-ground, stands a gentle, lovely angel-form, with white and outspread wings—the GODDESS OF LIBERTY, the protecting spirit of UNCLE SAM, but not seen by him. She looks in rapture down upon the victorious termination of the struggle. But now let us look again at the game itself. On DAVIS'S side but one piece remains: LEE, driven to a corner, held in check by the Knights, SHERMAN and SHERIDAN, and mated by the opposition of the Church, has no alternative but to yield to GRANT, who, as King, may not press too closely on a fallen foe. The captured and broken pawns indicate, in their emaciated forms, the merciless spirit of their captor. On the side of UNCLE SAM the Queen is COLUMBIA, a lofty, majestic figure, unfurling her vindicated flag. Her position, strengthened by the Castles, supports the more active officers; and the pawns are well disposed for either attack or defense. The adversary's Castles have been taken, as well as the motley crew of pieces which throng the hither side of the board. The nefarious designs of DAVIS are foiled, and he is beaten at his own game."

THE HIGH-TONED LADIES OF RICHMOND.

AMONG other fallacies dissipated by this war is the one which assumed that to Southern ladies belonged a species of letters patent for dignity and the proprieties of behavior. But the facts prove them to be, after all, weak-minded sisters, no better than their sex elsewhere, but, on the contrary, somewhat more inclined to insolence, peevishness, and an insulting manner and bearing toward those they please to call Yankees—which is, in fact, the highest tribute they could pay to the chivalry and good temper of the Northern man, who can exercise forbearance and make allowance even to those who have done all in their power to rule the nation. Even in Richmond, where the clemency of the conqueror has struck the inhabitants with wonder, Indies can be met upon the streets who render their sour, sharp features still more repellent by a turning up of the nose, and a taunting protrusion of the under lip, supposed to be expressive of scorn; if you, out of ordinary etiquette, take the trouble to give them the inside on the pavement, they draw their skirts (sadly innocent of soap and water) together, to avoid contamination by contact with you, and march past like a female supernumerary at a country theatre. It is laughable at the same time that it is pitiable.

THE HOUR OF NORTHERN VICTORY.

ROLL not a drum, sound not a clarion-note
Of haughty triumph to the silent sky;
Exalt in the shout of joy in every throat,
And veil'd the flash of pride in every eye.

Not with Te Deums loud and high Hosannas,
Great as the awful victory we have won,
But with our arms reverse'd and lower'd banners
We render our work le done!

Thy work is done, God, terrible and just,
Who layest upon our hearts and hands this task,
And kneeling, with our foreheads in the dust,
We venture Peace to ask.

Bleeding and writhing underneath our sword,
Prostrate our brethren lie, Thy fallen foe,
Struck down by Thee through us, avenging Lord—
By Thy dread hand laid low.

For our own guilt have we been doomed to smite
These our own kindred Thy great laws defying,
These, our own flesh and blood, who now unite
In one thing only with us—bravely dying.

Dying how bravely, yet how bitterly!
Not for the better side, but for the worse,
Blindly and madly striving against Thee
For the bad cause where Thou hast set Thy curse.

All whom defeat we may not raise our voice,
Save in the thanksgiving of our prayer,
"Lord! we have fought the fight!" But to rejoice
Is ours no more, unless there.

Call back Thy dreadful ministers of wrath
Who have led on our hosts to this great day;
Let our last victory be the avenger's path,
And bid our weapons stay.

Upon our hand, freedom's inheritance,
Pure from the curse whose splendor of Thy face,
Where nations serving Thee to light advance,
Give us again our place.

Not our bewildering past propriety,
Not all thy former ill-requited grace,
But this one boon—Oh! grant so still to be
The hour of Hope to the whole human race.

15th April, 1865. FANNY KEMBLE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1865.

THE RIGHT WAY THE BEST WAY.

BY the necessity of the case the question of suffrage in certain States of the Union is now to be determined by the National Government. CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE, as is constantly reported, is about to issue a proclamation inviting the loyal citizens of Virginia to elect delegates to a Convention, he will do it with the consent and by the authority of the President. The qualifications of the voters for delegates will not be settled by the State of Virginia, and thousands who are empowered to vote by her old Constitution will doubtless be excluded by the tests which the United States authority will impose.

By the Constitution of the United States the national authority is bound to guarantee a republican form of government to every State. How can it do that in the case of Virginia, where there is now no Government except that of the military power of the United States? Clearly in one way only; and that is by enfranchising all the adult male population who will take an oath of unconditional fidelity to the Union; if solemn, absolute, express renunciation of the dogma of State sovereignty; and of entire acquiescence in the laws of Congress, in the acts of the Executive, and in total emancipation of the slaves.

If a condition of education be required, it is unfortunate; but it will exclude the most trusty citizens of the State, white and black.

If color shall disqualify, a disability not authorized by the Constitution and in direct conflict with the fundamental principle of the Government is introduced.

If a religious test be demanded the Constitution is equally violated.

The republican form of government which Congress is constitutionally bound to secure allows no arbitrary classification upon the ground of religion, of race, or of color. It contemplates a government of the people by the people for the people, and by no very serious is inexorably hostile to an oligarchy in every form.

It is of no importance whether the old Constitution of the State did or did not prescribe such tests. If every State which adopted the Constitution of the United States must be held to have had a republican form, it is enough that in all those States, except one, the basis of suffrage was such as not to exclude any considerable body of freemen, whatever their race, intelligence, or color.

But the question is now frankly encountered. Is that, by any torture of terms, to be justly called a republican form of government which arbitrarily disfranchises an immense body of the adult freemen of a State because of their complexion or race? Can they be more righteously disfranchised because of their hue than because of their height or their profession? They have the same natural rights as men, they have the same interests in the commonwealth as all others, and their rights and interests are now put in the hands of those others than those of the others would be in theirs. It would be thought a very hard fate if the residence of the white freemen in Virginia or North Carolina should be left to the decision of the black. It is equally hard, unjust, and unrepublican that the residence or status of the black freemen in those States should be intrusted to the white.

The difficulties and dangers of authorizing a general suffrage in those States are not so evident as those of refusing it. The refusal stimulates that great mass of the population lately enslaved, which by emancipation is now in every sense the equal of the poor white population of the same States. It prolongs indefinitely the agitation arising from an unjust discrimination. It gives a general sanction to the prejudice against color. It disheartens the colored freemen whom it does not embitter, and rebukes those who plead for all men natural rights to which, by the acknowledged principle of our system, all men are entitled. The refusal to enfranchise them is a deliberate repudiation of the fundamental principle declared in that Government justly exist by the consent of the governed. It emboldens the sneering skepticism which asks whether it can be so wise or so philosophically to enslave those whom it is right politically to degrade.

To these the question to be settled by the State Legislatures elected by white citizens alone is to base the political freedom of colored citizens upon the consent of a class, and not upon the same right from which that class derives its own franchise. And to leave it to be so settled when the United States Government has the right and the power and the opportunity of deciding it, is to shirk one of the most sacred responsibilities which the war has thrown upon it. The right way, the republican way, the American way, the humane way, is the safe way and the best way. Let all loyal freemen vote in reorganizing the States.

THE FIGHT ON ERIE.

THE excitement of the day in Wall Street is the fight on Erie. Millions of dollars are involved, not only to the combatants, but to careful outsiders who happen to have invested money in the stock. The belligerents are two of the greatest financiers Wall Street has ever known—the one, a young banker of preternatural sagacity and shrewdness; the other, a veteran operator, director in the road, holder of scores of millions, and commanding other millions from adherents.

In 1860 Erie stock sold at $5 a share. In 1863 it sold at $128. In 1865 it sold at $44. Since then at $85; and since then at 968. People in the country, who don't read money articles or stock exchange slang, have no idea how much romance, how much happiness, how much agony and heartache, how much prosperity, and how much utter hurly-burly there is in Erie. We bought Erie at $5 and sold it at $128 or thereabouts, made a great fortune. B, who bought it at $128 and sold out at $44 or thereabouts, lost a fortune. C, again, who bought it at $130 and sold above $80, did very well indeed. A's wife, bred in poverty, flaunts her diamonds in our face at the Opera. B's daughter, who was obliged to leave the expensive boarding-school and college at which they were being prepared for fashionable life, and hence to work out their own livelihood in stores and offices. C's family begin to think that they can afford to go to Saratoga, and that they can not afford to keep up their intimacy with their neighbors who sell milk. The whole because Erie would fluctuate so wildly.

Tis not many months since the leading directors of the Erie pronounced the Company bankrupt. It had been bankrupt before. Hopelessly bankrupt. It had issued scrip to cover into the hands of a receiver (who died worth half a million), and had been duly reorganized. It had been a mortal wound that general prosperity struck the drifting corkers, lifted it up, and carried it forward to solvency. It paid its debts. It began to earn money. One day it astonished people. It paid a dividend. The old heads in Wall Street growled, and predicted that 'twould be the last, as 'twas the first for many years. Everyone who had bought Erie, and saw no reason why the Erie—the natural link between the lakes and the sea-board—should not become permanently prosperous. They predicted that the stock would rise to par. This insane prophecy was treated with the scorn it deserved, and the credit of those who uttered it suffered severely. Still, somehow, another dividend was declared, a surplus was announced, and the stock did rise not only to par but to 25 per cent. premium. It then became apparent to the old men of Wall Street that the world had not stood still for the past four or five years, as they had assumed, but that it was constantly moving and in the same direction. Presently new questions arose. The late President of the Erie had always believed that the war was going to end in sixty days, and had scoffed at the idea of buying iron when gold was a premium. Thus the road, in railroad parlance, "ran down" while simultaneously the increase of traffic, occasioned by the war and the lessening of the Atlantic and Great Western, called for an increase of equipment. Still, so strong was the confidence in the Erie managers in the early restoration of peace and full in gold, that purchases of iron and equipment were postponed, until at last the division superintendents threatened to resign unless at once needed repairs were made and equipment supplied. This brought matters to a crisis, and at the eleventh hour iron was bought, and locomotives and cars contracted for in large numbers, on the basis of gold at 250. A debt of some six million dollars was created, and temporary loans provided for paying it. Stockholders were kept in complete ignorance of the fact until dividend day came round, and then—in February last—it was announced that the great Erie Railway Company, which had done such a fine business and so securely placed its stock on the dividend paying list, was now more staggering under a floating debt, and seemed to be steering straight for the old harbor—bankruptcy.

The stock had fluctuated before this discovery between 120 and 75. It now fell steadily, with few reactions, to 44 per cent.—the leading operators on the bear side being an influential director of the road and the banker previously mentioned. Before it reached 44 these parties parted company. The director for reasons best known to him a recovery in the stock was possible, that the earnings of the road were increasing, and that a way out of trouble might be found. While, therefore, the banker and his friends continued to sell at the stock which people wanted to buy, the director covered his shorts and became a purchaser. He got 100 shares for every 50 thousand from 45 to 50. It is reported that the broker who represented the bear banker and his friends also sold him 100 shares at or about 45; is at any rate, he bought enough to turn the tide of speculation in Wall Street, to bring a number of ruined bears to prodigious punishment, and to largely swell the bull phalanx.

Nor was his opponent behind him in quickness of perception. Very few days after the great director had made his first purchases of Erie, the banker scented his scheme and began to fortify. He, too, entered the market as a buyer of Erie. Seeing his belief in its worthlessness, so far as could be gathered by acquaintances, was unchanged—and it is hard to say which of the pair bought most stock. Between the two it has steadily risen from 44 to 85, and the little bears perished almost to a cub.

At 85 the market seemed to hesitate. On the one side money was easy, and promised to remain so. The Erie receipts for April were $1,472,000, and promised to be $1,500,000 for May. The Erie, in spite of earnings, expenses falling with the fall in gold, the Company would find no difficulty in disposing of its floating debt without suspending dividends. But, on the other hand, there was the obvious absence of buying by the public. The fall from 128 to 44, and the gloomy predictions of bankruptcy which had been current in Wall Street, had created a panic, a memory, had not yet been forgotten, and people at large would not buy Erie. Many were putting their money in Government bonds. Others were buying railroad securities in preference to Erie.

The banker read the indications and sold his stock. The market reeled under the blow. From 85 the price fell to 73 in a couple of days. Now allies for the bulls appeared in the arena, and 10,000 shares of Erie in "one block" were bought by a single purchaser. But the market, though it fluttered upward a few per cent. on this operation, did not permanently recover. It soon fell back again, and the price a few days since was 68½.

The question among the bulls and bears now is, which will win—the Great Director or the Great Banker? In respect of means they are equally balanced. Either might check for four or five millions of dollars without astonishing the seller of their respective banks. Either could borrow a score of millions if necessary. The one has the more capacities and the intrinsic value of the property to help him; the other relies on the public distrust of railway property, and especially Erie railway property, and likewise on the general rush for Government securities.

There seems to be very little question but that the true stocks of railroad and railroad bonds are or ought to pay regular dividends exceeding in amount the interest on Government bonds. Their population must increase as new regions in this country that in the course of a few years every established enterprise, however slim its early receipts, soon works itself into a handsome position. It is not easy to conceive any combination of untoward circumstances that could reduce the receipts of the great trunk lines more than 25 per cent. below their present amount; and it is not unreasonable to believe that they may, after the shock produced by a return to specie payments, take even more money than they do now. The way traffic on the Erie at present yields more income than its entire traffic—way and through—did in 1859. This is due, not to the war, but to the steady progress of the country, the increase of people and of property to be moved, and not least to the development of internal industry and traffic caused by the issue of paper-money. That five years hence the stocks of our leading lines will pay regular dividends of 8 @ 10 per cent., and will be held and pay for investors, is generally admitted in Wall Street.

But meanwhile it is beyond any man's judgment to decide what price they may command, or whether the Erie, paying 7 per cent., should sell until within a couple of years at to @ 80; now, paying no more, it sells at 250 @ 300. No change has taken place in the property; but within a year or two people seem to have awakened to its value. If the public for a year or more decide to place their savings in Government bonds exclusively, railway stocks may decline far below their real value. In the end intrinsic values always assert themselves in Wall Street. But before they do so the operations of speculators often control events and prices to an extent which baffles those who rely exclusively on the abstract laws of political economy.

REBEL TERMS.

MR. STEPHENS, MR. REAGAN, General LEE, and a multitude of American citizens who have served the rebellion in a civil or military capacity are reported to be in communication at the press, very lavish of statements of the conditions upon which the Union may be restored. One gentleman expresses his readiness to resume the status of a citizen immediately, provided the Government is properly lenient. Slavery is perhaps gone, says another, but confiscation and the 14th article of the suffrage must not be pressed. We have not yet seen any report of the terms which JEFFERSON DAVIS is disposed to accord to the United States. But as he declared that he would rather fraternize with hyenas than Yankees, he will probably be very liberal if not generous, with us.

That they have committed the most stupendous crimes—that, in order to overthrow an equal government, they have plunged and and frozen thousands of innocent men—that they have hung and massacred in all cruel ways hundreds of their own immediate fellow-citizens—that they have striven to destroy their society itself, in order to perpetuate the unimaginable wrong of human slavery—that the letter of ALEXANDER HAMILTON, that they have been directly cognizant of a plan to murder MR. LINCOLN and other high officers, which he considered worthy for consideration—all these appalling crimes, for which many of them will be tried for their lives, seem entirely to escape the attention of these airy gentlemen who kindly advise the Government in this emergency of victory.

It seems to us that MR. STEPHENS and his friends would do wisely to imitate the silence of JEFFERSON DAVIS.

A LATE REBEL UPON STATE REORGANIZATION.

WE allude elsewhere to the speech of MR. W. A. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, a gentleman who has not been sincerely a rebel, and who heartily rejoices at the overthrow of the rebel despotism. It is important as showing how the mind of a man whose heart is right but whose head is wrong; and it is significant as showing that a good Union man would readily advise the people by allowing the class of citizens to decide not only whether another class should vote, but whether they should be allowed to remain in the State. That certainly does not seem to us the road that leads to peace.

But in Virginia also there has been a meeting looking to reorganization at which the significant speech was made by A. H. H. STUART. MR. STUART says that he supposes Virginia still has rights under the Constitution of the United States. But those have only suspended during the abortive effort to sever the connection. He concedes that the attempted revolution has finally failed. He does not call it successful; it ought never to have been attempted. He has no word of sorrow or penitence or even regret for the wrong and senseless waged upon the Government. On the contrary, he speaks of the late authority of the rebellion at Richmond with perfect respect. But as that authority has disappeared, he thinks that the people of Virginia are remitted to their rights as Virginians, and the extent of those rights must be determined according to the Constitution of the United States. He adds that if the universal assumption of "the Northern States" that the ordinances of secession were nullities be true, then the moment the war ceases the Southern States resume their places as members of the Union.

These are the sentiments of a man who is merely conquered. That the rebellion was wrong, that the Union is more than a partnership at will, that the States are not by right supremely sovereign against the Union, MR. STUART does not say, and probably does not believe. The Union is stronger than the Confederacy—that is all. The national Government is the victorious party. Good sense requires that the fact be acknowledged, and Virginia will try to renew the war. Such is Mr. STUART'S opinion. Such, doubtless, is the opinion of the great mass of his white fellow-citizens.

But if good sense requires him to acknowledge the fact of the national superiority in power, does it not require us to acknowledge the fact that he is no friend of that power? He submits because fighting is useless, not because fighting is wrong. Do we wish to instruct Virginia to send home and honest State servant, eighty has got the worst of it, but State sovereignty is right after all. Is that the qualification for the ballot which we propose to demand in Virginia?

If the ordinance of secession be a nullity, says Mr. STUART, when it ceases, Virginia is back again in the Union with all her rights.

But who is to decide when war has ceased in Virginia? The Government of the United States. The war against that Government was waged by those who hold Mr. STUART'S views. He and his friends have not changed their views. Can the war be only said to have ended if they are to control the reorganization of the State? It may not break out again for thirty years. But it will be the same war whenever it reappears. War will have ceased in Virginia when the State Government rests securely in the hands of her people who abhor the doctrine of State sovereignty and hold to the equal rights of all men. Until that day the forces of the United States can not be safely withdrawn. Until that day no adequate reorganization of Virginia as a State of the Union is possible.

A BIT OF HISTORY.

ONE of the fiercest and most unscrupulous opponents of Secretary STANTON lately insinuated that he was not as sternly hostile to rebellion while he was in the Cabinet of Mr. BUCHANAN as he has been in that of Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON. How overwhelmingly rapid such an insinuation is fortunately found in the speech of Judge HOLT, delivered in Charleston on the evening of the day upon which the flag was raised on Fort Sumter. Judge HOLT was a member of Mr. BUCHANAN'S last Cabinet, with Mr. STANTON and General DIX. In his Charleston speech he alludes to the "murder of "the traitor FLOYD," in view of his own purposes, when he selected Major ANDERSON to command in Charleston harbor. Wicked rebels have sometimes been fatally mistaken in the choice of instruments. He continues:

"Great, too, have been the surprise and terror of these wicked men when they have found their trusted instruments failing in their hands: but perhaps few of these exhibitions have equaled that which was witnessed at Washington when the unfaltering fidelity of Major ANDERSON and his little command was first fully manifested. When intelligence reached the Capital that, by a bold and decisive movement, this command had been transferred from Moultrie to Sumter, and was safe from the rifled guns left behind, the emotions of FLOYD were absolutely uncontrollable—emotions of mingled mortification and anguish and rage and panic. His fury seemed that of some baffled fiend, who discovers suddenly opening at his own feet the gulf of ruin which he had been preparing for another. Over all the details of this passionate outburst of a conspirator, caught and entangled in his own toils, a veil of official secrecy still hangs, and it may be that history will never be privileged to transfer this memorable scene to its pages. There is now, however, whose absence to-day we have all deplored, and to whom the nation is grateful for the masterly address by which he has conveyed what he has fought this rebellion in all the vicissitudes of its career—your Secretary of War—who, were he here, could add testimony to the truthfulness of my words. He looked upon that scene, and the conspirator needs not to be told that he looked upon it with scorn and defiance. [Here the audience, rising to their feet, gave three cheers for Secretary STANTON.]"

TWO VOICES FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

SEVERAL gentlemen have come from North Carolina to Washington to confer with the Government upon the subject of the reorganization of that State. Among them is the Hon. W. W. HOLDEN, who is understood to be a representative of the Union men at the South who are sincerely glad of the triumph of the Government. He was indeed a delegate to the State Convention in 1861, and signed the ordinance of secession, because, as he says, escape was "physically and morally impossible." But for some time, as the editor of a paper at Raleigh, Mr. HOLDEN has rebelled and resisted rebellion, and was the "Pence" or Union candidate for Governor against VANCE. At a late Union meeting in Raleigh Mr. HOLDEN made a speech which is worthy of attention as the authoritative statement of the present views of the white Union men at the South upon the subject of reorganization.

The colored Union citizens of North Carolina have also expressed their views. Let us compare the two speeches. Which is the more just, constitutional, simple, and thorough?

There can be no doubt of the sincerity of Mr. HOLDEN'S exultation at the overthrow of the rebellion. He accepts emancipation. Regrets for slavery, he says, are now vain. He reminds the people of this State, both in Convention and in the Legislature, to define the status and condition of this emancipated race." Mr. HOLDEN says that he would educate the colored citizen; recognise his marriage relations; let him read his Bible and hold property. "but beyond that I leave him to the future action of the States themselves. . . . . The whole vast continent is destined to fall under the control of the Anglo-Saxon race—the governing and self-governing race. I look to the wisdom of the people in Convention to decide the relations of the two races."

Why white men are more the "people" of the State than colored men Mr. HOLDEN omits to say. And what an American means by talking of a "governing race" is a charming inquiry. Has Mr. HOLDEN yet to learn that in this country the Government is not founded upon family, or race, or color, but upon the consent of the governed? He proposes to educate the colored men. Does he forget that a large proportion of the "governing race" in this State are themselves unable to read? Did it not occur to Mr. HOLDEN that if the colored citizen who stood behind the platform and listened to his speech were yesterday a slave, the orator, was yesterday a rebel, who signed the ordinance of secession, however unwillingly, upon that very same spot?

This is one North Carolina plan of reorganization—that the Government of the United States should consult the white people, who are by the only part of the population which has been always loyal, and commit their future and the tranquility of the country to them. But there has been in various degrees disloyal, and which regards the colored race as inferior and of unequal rights.

The other plan is presented in a petition from the colored citizens of North Carolina to the President. They confess that they are poor and greatly despised. They do not believe, but they urge that they have tried to help those who upheld the old flag through all the rebellion—and with boundless fidelity. Whether they can say how effectively they did it. They declare that they can not see the justice of denying the elective franchise to men who have been fighting for the country, and who are freely given to men who have just returned from five years' fighting against it. "As you were once a citizen of North Carolina," they say, appealing to the President, "we need not remind you that up to the year 1835 free colored men voted in this State, and were heard, by their white ally, to their detriment to its interest. What we desire is, that preliminary to elections in the returning States you would order the enrollment of all loyal men without regard to color."

Surely no plan could be more just, more simple, more constitutional, and more effective. This will secure the people of this State into a convention as Mr. HOLDEN wishes. And if this is not done, if an arbitrary enfranchisement is made, the question of property, height, or age, or property, or weight, or size, how can Congress acknowledge the government that may result as the republican form of government, and how it is constitutionally bound to secure to every State?

OUR ARTISTS DURING THE WAR.

THE soldiers are marching home, and with them the noble army of artists. Their pencils are to-day better gentlemen should be fully recognized. There was never a war before of which the varying details, the striking and picturesque incidents, the people of this nation by land and sea, and all the innumerable romantic incidents of a great struggle have been recorded with the eye of truth by the most skilful and devoted artists. To them we owe the national familiarity with the features of our famous soldiers, sailors, and statesmen. To all they who have studied the poorest boy in the land to own a portrait of the bravest hero. All over the country thousands and thousands of the faces and forms which the war has made illustrious are tacked and pinned and pasted upon the humblest walls. Whole regiments have had portraits of a beloved officer, whole corps of a commander; and they owe the precious pleasure to the quick brain and nimble hand of the artists.

The pictorial history of the war which they have written with their pencils in the field, upon their knees, upon a knapsack, upon a drum, upon a drum-head, upon a block, upon a cannon, upon a wet deck, in the gray dawn, in the dusk twilight, with freezing or fevered fingers; upon hospital cots, in ambulances, from a corner in a tent; under the sky, in snow and rain and sunshine; from the bough of a tree through which the bullets were whistling, from a corner of the deck over which the shells whistled and crashed; in the glow of victory, in the rage of defeat—this is a history quivering with life, faithful, terrible, romantic, the value of which will grow with every year.

We may be pardoned for special pride in our own artists who have gone through all the long and stirring campaigns of this war, commencing eating its most interesting incidents and noted men, so that the volumes of the Weekly are really a vivid history of the struggle. Moore. A. R. WARD, THEODORE R. DAVIS, WILLIAM WAUD, ROBERT WEIR, ANDREW MCCALUM, A. W. WARREN, and others, have not been less busy and scarcely less imperiled than the soldiers. They have made the weary marches and dangerous voyages. They have shared the soldier's fare; they have ridden and waded, and climbed and floundered, always trusting in lead pencils and keeping their paper dry. When the battle began they were there. They drew the enemy's fire as well as our own. The first shock, the heaving tumult, the smoky sway of battle from side to side, the line, the assault, the victory—they were a part of all, and their faithful fingers, depicting the scene, have made us a part also.

Meanwhile the most careful and admirable series of memorable portraits by Mr. W. S. L. JEWETT has constantly adorned our paper, and the rough sketches of battles and incidents, hastily sent from the field or the deck, have been faithfully and skillfully elaborated by Mr. S. ETTINGE. Mr. THOMAS NAST is already known to our readers. With deft eyes and hands it will be a sly interesting incident or a cunning famous face which escapes proper treatment in the Weekly.

"WHO'LL BE CHIEF MOURNER?"

THE Rev. M. D. CONWAY gives in the Commonwealth this agreeable sketch of the late performance at FORNIANA'S Theatre, Washington. Mr. WOOD left for Paris immediately after the play, and, as we learn, took no part in the meeting called by Mr. ADAMS, and mentioned in Englishman.

"You may judge of the scorn with which Americans in London read in Thursday morning's papers the following notice:

"SIR,—I shall be much obliged if you will state that the meeting of the American in London will be held at this hotel to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, with reference to some appropriate expression of sentiment concerning the lamentable intelligence from the United States.

"Very truly yours,

"FERNANDO WOOD.

"Grosvenor Hotel, Pulteney, April 16."

"It was not to be expected. A costly number of loyal Americans went there determined to prevent this mocking effort at Wood to be the American representative and spokesman in London (where he has been for two weeks), and there was in the room ready to use a certain number of Secessionists, who were proper and praiseworthy destruction at the United States as a good moment for the destruction of New York. When the meeting all been seated in silence for a few moments, a modest worker of the same Grosvenor Hotel came to the door and proclaimed, 'Gentlemen! the Honorable FERNANDO WOOD!' As that sleek and oily individual walked in, four and sundry, some individual began a clap with his hands—however he was utterly covered up and ridiculous among those who remained silent, and was drowned by every throat. FERNANDO caught the inclosure in his breast, and bowed himself down to the upper part of the room. Some one then proposed that he (Wood) should take the chair; but some voice was heard and passed from the back, Dr. BEACH, of Kentucky, entered the door and called out: 'Gentlemen, I have come from the Secession Club to express our sympathy, and have a message from a number of eminent Americans there to those who have gathered here.' Dr. B. then said that it was the opinion of Mr. ADAMS and the gentlemen in consultation with him, that a general meeting of American would be held in St. James's Hall on Monday evening, and that all should receive any minor expression until then. Mr. Wendell Phillips and Mr. Beecher might go on; but he was interrupted by a call to adjourn. The next attempt was by Mr. FERNANDO WOOD for calling us together; but Rev. CHARLES REMOND, sub-agent with Dr. HUNN for the reception of fugitive slaves, pushed if American needed to thank any man for calling them together; whereupon the motion to thank no one was put, the crowd left the room to Wood and his friend. You may think this manifestation of calling hard; but I assure you that it was what the most eminent or honorable men we were able to stand, to behold the countenance of one who had thrown his flag and sword at the arm that has crowned America with devastation and grief, in the very hour when that arm had filled up the measure of its iniquities."

THE PROPRIETIES

AS long-mum patriot in Philadelphia, with a keen sense of propriety, suggests that the sympathetic Copperheads should wear petticoats for thirty days in honor of JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE FUTURE OF THE REPUBLIC.

THE Rev. W. H. MILBURN has been invited by thirty of the most eminent Episcopal clergymen of the city to deliver a lecture with this title at Irving Hall on the evening of June 1 at eight o'clock. Mr. MILBURN'S accomplishments as a public orator are well and widely known. His misfortune of blindness always commends him to peculiar sympathy; and his long residence at the South ought to enable him to give valuable testimony as to the probable public sentiment in that region.

LITERARY.

MRS. BELLA Z. SPENCER, the author of "Orion" and many popular tales and sketches in the magazines, has also written a very simple practical romance, and who enters upon her work with ardor and resolution, has been placed in the chief editorial chair of the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post, of which she has been for some time assistant editor. We anticipate for the paper a renewed success in her skillful hands.

"O Mother Dear Jerusalem. Th. Old Hymn; its Origin and Genealogy," edited by WILLIAM C. PRIME (A. D. D. RANDOLPH), is the title of a very curious little volume which the accomplished editor has performed a labor of love, for which he will have the hearty thanks of all historical and religious scholars. Mr. PRIME has traced the rise of that popular hymn of the Christian fathers and the old Latin hymns with admirable conciseness and clearness. In no accessible form in this country is it so well presented as in this little book.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE great affair of the week is the grand review of the national armies at Washington. This is the largest event of the war—that to which our armies have looked forward in many a weary march and hard fought battle. It was rather a grand panoramic spectacle than a review. Instead of marching to the soldiers, they spread over them a certain color that. As we go to press we know only of the final review of Sherman's army. That of the potomac, on Tuesday and Wednesday, the Sixth Army Corps held the advance, the Fifth Corps, Hancock, and Gibbon came the second, followed by Burnside's cavalry. We shall next week be able to give a detailed account of the review, accompanied by illustrations.

On the 22d of May President JOHNSON issued an important proclamation regarding trade in ports and in the interior Southern States. He opens the ports closed at the time also by Presidential Decree, except Galveston; and he withdraws from this date all pretense of belligerent rights—the cutting blockade-runners and contraband traders out of legal protection of any sort. He also withdraws every restriction upon trade inland east of the Mississippi.

It is now established beyond doubt that Jefferson Davis was caught disguised in woman's clothes. The following is from the Savannah Herald:

"Davis, however, had the self-possession to make a most desperate attempt to escape. Hastily throwing off the fighting. Mrs. Davis had arrayed her husband in her own dress, put on his hat, tied her head and veil over his head so as to conceal his face completely. When thus disguised, he left President of the Confederacy was a decided resemblance to an old woman. Mrs. Davis took the arm of Mrs. Reagan, Mrs. Davis's sister the other; and thus, apparently supporting the tottering steps of the old lady, attempted to make away from his wife's protection into a neighboring swamp.

"But as Mr. Davis's form stepped the trio, however, when a gleam appeared was made to them by the prudent daughters to hasten, as he continued his pace at a quicker out of the range of the bullets. One of the soldiers promptly replied that he would not see 'an old woman like after Jeff Davis'; he was here somewhere, and they meant to have him. A few moments, took off the head-veil, and, instead of an old lady, found the well-known features of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

"The officers and other members of the Reilag party were quickly arrested.

"Before daylight the forces started on their return to Macon, where, at 10 o'clock, Colonel Pritchard reported the news of his glorious success to General Wilson. He was immediately ordered to Augusta with the captives.

"From Augusta he was ordered to conduct his prisoners forthwith to Washington. He accordingly embarked on board the steamer Atlantic from Savannah, reaching this city at an early hour this morning. Here Colonel Pritchard and party were met by Major-General DIX, who immediately started for Hilton Head, as Fort Pulaski the Envilee was expected to be at. Mr. H. W. Hilliard Guilmore, Judge Chase, and others, who went on board the steamer.

"We are told by those who saw Mr. Davis that on his journey in his ride alone from what it was four years ago. He seemed to be in good health, and bore the fatigue of the journey well. The prisoners were transferred from the steamer to the fort at Hilton Head, and from there to Washington by the same gun-boats connecting the two steamers, Mr. Davis and party are put to-night in Fort Monroe.

"A. R. Stephens, General Wheeler and three of his staff, C. C. Clay, Colonel Thompson, Postmaster-General of Texas, Colonel Thomas, Captain Moody, John H. Reagan, Postmaster-General, Colonel Harrison, brother of General Joseph E. Johnston, are also prisoners."

NEWS ITEMS.

In the neighborhood of Fort Pillow the negro troops now in the United States service have a lively remembrance of the wicked massacre of their predecessors in the service of the United States. Indeed, it appears, the genius for massacre, and the ingenious forms, in which it has been executed by the negroes, to massacre all, parole prisoners, and to burn the wounded in the hospitals, were made in time to prevent the work; but still there was no sharp calculation as to the size of the fire and the whom called by driving the negroes into the fort from which they were marching, with a loss of about twenty of them killed and wounded.

Dispatches from Nashville announce the capture of ex-Governor HARRIS, of Tennessee, and the late Executive of Tennessee. It is added that some of the State archives, and specially the papers, belonging to the State, are secured.

General Washburne, lately in command at Memphis, has been superseded, and General John E. Smith assumes his place.

Major-General Sedgwick's sword, worn by him on the day of his death, has been presented to the Connecticut Legislature.

A dispatch to the Philadelphia Inquirer states that John Surratt left Washington the morning after the murder at 10 A. M., got to Philadelphia at 4 P. M., and to Boston, Mass., at 8 P. M., Massachusetts, where he was delayed by train missing connections. He remained at Boston for part of the day and went direct to Burlington, where, in getting his papers, he inadvertently left behind with his overcoat upon it. At St. Albans he left the train and proceeded on foot to Canada, where he was met by a friend on the road to Montreal, where he was arrested by some of the sympathizers. He left the morning of the 14th in a carriage with George N. Sanders. He then left and went to the direction of a monastery. He was known to be in that vicinity that day, and can not also be found or heard of. It is probable that he is within their walls.

General Molineux, of New York, took formal possession of Augusta on May 24, and found ammunition hundred thousand bales of cotton, five million dollars' worth of ordnance and other property. The Augusta Constitutionalist of May 24 says: Jeff Davis's specie train was captured, and one million eight-six-hundred-and-odd dollars of gold and silver. The Savannah River has been opened to Savannah, and the navigation of the Savannah, Charleston, Augusta, to Charleston will soon be complete.

On the 25th of May Davis and party arrived at Hilton Head, on board the steamer Clyde. On the 26th Davis and party passed from their vessels, and were shortly after transferred to Fortress Monroe.

The late rebel Secretary Brown, of Georgia, reached Washington May 18, under guard, and was placed in the Old Capitol Prison.

One of the Canada papers says: "Dr. Blackburn, for some years a resident of this place in St. Lawrence Hall, and accused of forwarding from Bermuda bales of infected goods to the United States in November last, has since arrested through a warrant issued in Toronto. Dr. Blackburn has been residing in Bermuda for some time past, and before yesterday at the St. Lawrence Hall. When he left for Toronto, he was accompanied by a friend, who, he declared, and said to them, 'I am entirely innocent; but I have been informed against, and I am going to Toronto to be tried.' He then left for Toronto, and has not since been heard of. Dr. Blackburn has just taken the same step; and also to ers, such as Mr. Young, have gone already so far as to declare openly that they had abandoned their former positions." It appears from Wednesday's dispatches that Mr. Young has not yet left Montreal, in consequence of the illness of his wife. John Surratt was a good Catholic, as also others of the family, and was known to his pastor. He visited another few weeks, and yet all that time was regularly to her church, up-peering as usual at the communion and age attending Mass.

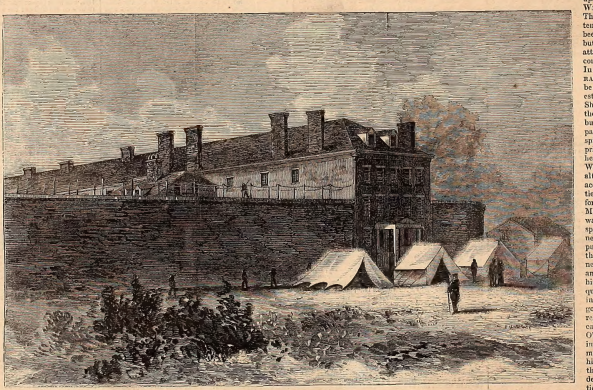
TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

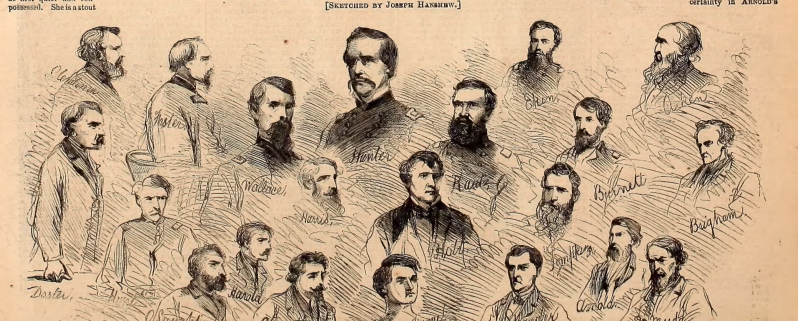


THE record of the trial of the conspirators at Washington forms a memorable portion of the history of the rebellion. A portion of this record we endeavor this week to lay before our readers. The trial is likely to be prolonged beyond the limits at first fixed by the popular expectation.

The building in which the trial is held is that in which the prisoners have been confined since their removal from the Saugus and Montauk. It is the old Penitentiary building, now included in the arsenal grounds, about 300 feet long by 50 feet wide, and built of brick. The west front of the building is upon the banks of the Potomac. There is a popular report which locates the last resting-place of the assassin BOOTH under a portion of the building. The room selected for the trial is on the north side of the east wing, and measures 30 feet by 40. The prisoners' dock extends 20 feet along the west wall, and is on a slightly-raised platform, surrounded by a plain railing. The Court sits at a large table on the north side; and on the left and facing the prisoners is the witness-stand. The names of the prisoners are as follow: Dr. SAMUEL MUDD, DAVID C. HAROLD, LEWIS PAYNE, EDWARD SPANGLER, MICHAEL O'LOUGHLIN, J. W. ATZEROTT, SAMUEL ARNOLD, and Mrs. SURRATT.

At the opening of the trial Dr. MUDD appeared calm and attentive, ARNOLD was restless and nervous, PAYNE, dressed in a gray woolen shirt, preferred to gaze on the prospect outside of the window. He had a listless, dreamy look, and his dark hair, irregularly parted, hung over a masculine face, clouding a pair of dark-blue eyes. O'LOUGHLIN was watchful, keenly observing every movement in the room. His forehead is broad, but low, and covered with a bushy head of hair. His eyes are dark; his complexion pale and bloodless, with a heavy black imperial and mustache. ATZEROTT, but for his muscles, it is said, might be taken for a spectator. His hair and beard are of a reddish, dusky color, and his eyes are light.—Mrs. SURRATT appeared at first quiet and self-possessed. She is a stout woman, of about forty-five.

BIRTH-PLACE OF PRESIDENT ANDREW JOHNSON, RALEIGH, N. C.—[SKETCHED BY DAVIS.]



PENITENTIARY BUILDING AT WASHINGTON, IN WHICH THE CONSPIRATORS ARE CONFINED AND UNDERGOING TRIAL.
[SKETCHED BY JOSEPH HASHIMM.]

The Court consists of the following officers: Major-General DAVID HUNTER, Major-General LEW WALLACE, Brevet Major-General AUGUST VON KAUTZ, Brigadier-Gen. ALBION P. HOWE, Brigadier-Gen. ROBERT S. FOSTER, Brevet Brigadier-General JAMES A. EKIN, Brigadier-General T. M. HARRIS, Brevet Colonel C. H. TOMPKINS, Lieut.-Colonel CLENDENIN, and Brigadier-Gen. JOSEPH HOLT, Judge-Advocate.

Employed as counsel for the accused are Mr. THOMAS EWING, Attorney STONE, WALTER S. COX, Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, and Messrs. AIKEN and CLAGGETT. Colonel W. E. DOSTER appears for PAYNE and ATZEROTT.

The testimony thus far given points in three directions: first, toward the identification of the accused; secondly, toward their intimate association with each other; and, thirdly, toward the complicity with them of the rebel authorities at Richmond and their commissioned agents in Canada. The two chief witnesses in fixing guilt upon the accused are WEICHMAN and LLOYD. The existence of an extensive conspiracy has been abundantly proved, but the measure of guilt attaching to the different conspirators is various. In regard to Mrs. SURRATT, there can scarcely be any doubt of the deepest guilt on her part. She not only harbored the principal criminals, but took a prominent part in the whole conspiracy. WEICHMAN, the principal witness against her, was a clerk in the War Department; yet, although so intimately acquainted with the parties—boarding as he did, for several months at Mrs. SURRATT's, so well was the secret of the conspiracy kept that he was never aware of their final purpose. It is proved that Dr. MUDD had a near relation to BOOTH and his accomplices, and his conduct when first questioned by the officers in pursuit of BOOTH will go hard against him. In regard to PAYNE there can be no question.—O'LOUGHLIN is deeply implicated by the testimony, though how far his actual knowledge of the intended crime rendered him an active participant is still uncertain. There is still more uncertainty in ARNOLD'S case. It seems quite probable that SPANGLER actively and knowingly participated in BOOTH's crime. AGAINST ATZERODT the testimony weighs heavily. It is proved that GEORGE N. SANDERS did know BOOTH, notwithstanding his statements to the contrary — statements which must, in the light of the evidence, induce a suspicion of guilt. It is known that the Confederate agents in Canada had immense sums of money to dispose of, to be occupied in the most nefarious schemes. It is proved by documentary evidence that JEFFERSON DAVIS received letters from murderous villains offering to rid the confederacy of its deadliest enemies, and these letters bear DAVIS's indorsement referring them to the attentive consideration of the rebel War Department.

But as yet the record is only a partial one. We give below a large portion of the testimony delivered in court.

RECORD OF THE TRIAL.

The trial opened on Wednesday, May 10. It was at first determined that the proceedings should be secret, and this rule was observed during the first three days; but on the 13th the gag reporters were admitted, and the testimony taken during the previous days was ordered to be published. The charges made against the accused was that they had conspired with John Wilkes Booth for the murder of President Lincoln, Vice-President Johnson, Secretary Seward, and General GRANT. With these charges a specification was joined the names of Jefferson Davis, George N. Sanders, Beverly Tucker, Jacob Thompson, William C. Cleary, Clement C. Clay, and other rebel agents in Canada. It formed an important part of the charges that the purpose of the conspirators, in the execution of their bloody work, was to aid the cause of existing rebellion. The first of the specifications of the charge was that the accused, with the coconspirators of the three murdered persons, carried out the details of their conspiracy within the limits of the Military District of Washington. The remainder charge relating to Booth, deceased, was that he killed President Lincoln, Major Rathbone, his daughter was then his fiancée, in the execution of his crime and in escaping from Ford's Theatre. The charge of Booth's death was also mentioned in the act and in the escape of the murderer. Against Lewis Payne it was charged that he assaulted with intent to murder Secretary Seward, his son Frederick and Augustus Seward, and Major H. Rathbone, also a guest in the house. Against Atzerodt the intent to murder Vice-President Johnson. Against Mrs. Surratt a similar charge with the title of Lieutenant-General Grant. Against Arnold, assistance rendered to John Wilkes Booth, and against Mrs. Surratt, Mary Jackson, Samuel Arnold, Michael O'Laughlin, Edward Spangler, and Samuel Mudd, the same conspiracy, with the purpose, intent, and method of carrying out the conspiracy, as charged against the principal conspirators, and the details of their conspiracy within the limits of the Military District of Washington. The remainder charge relating to Booth, deceased, was that he killed President Lincoln, Major Rathbone, his daughter was then his fiancée, in the execution of his crime and in escaping from Ford's Theatre. The charge of Booth's death was also mentioned in the act and in the escape of the murderer. Against Lewis Payne it was charged that he assaulted with intent to murder Secretary Seward, his son Frederick and Augustus Seward, and Major H. Rathbone, also a guest in the house. Against Atzerodt the intent to murder Vice-President Johnson. Against Arnold, assistance rendered to John Wilkes Booth, and against Mrs. Surratt, Mary Jackson, Samuel Arnold, Michael O'Laughlin, Edward Spangler, and Samuel Mudd, the same conspiracy, with the purpose, intent, and method of carrying out the conspiracy, as charged against the principal conspirators, and the details of their conspiracy within the limits of the Military District of Washington, constituting the charge relating to Booth, deceased, was that he killed President Lincoln, Major Rathbone, his daughter was then his fiancée, in the execution of his crime and in escaping from Ford's Theatre. The charge of Booth's death was also mentioned in the act and in the escape of the murderer. Against Lewis Payne it was charged that he assaulted with intent to murder Secretary Seward, his son Frederick and Augustus Seward, and Major H. Rathbone, also a guest in the house. Against Atzerodt the intent to murder Vice-President Johnson. Against Arnold, assistance rendered to John Wilkes Booth, and against Mrs. Surratt, Mary Jackson, Samuel Arnold, Michael O'Laughlin, Edward Spangler, and Samuel Mudd, the same conspiracy, with the purpose, intent, and method of carrying out the conspiracy, as charged against the principal conspirators, and the details of their conspiracy within the limits of the Military District of Washington. The remainder plied, "Mosby's." Harold returned that he was of A. P. Hill's command. He said his brother was wounded below Richmond, and asked if Jett would not take him down by the lines. After a while Harold announced that he and his companion were the assassinators of the President. The entire party then crossed the river and went to Garrett's, where they left Booth and went on to the seat Harold went back to Garrett's.

Lieutenant Conger and Sergeant Boston Corbett were then examined in regard to the pursuit and capture of Booth. Their testimony possessed nothing to the witness have been made public.

John Greenleaf, keeper of the Pennsylvania House, testified that Atzerott and Booth had been in earnest conversation for about an hour on the night of the 13th in his room and Booth would walk across the room and look out of the window, and then return when no liquor had been offered by Atzerott. Said, "Conger was in that city on Monday the 12th. On that day I have friends enough to give as much money as will make us all rich." Conger was not in the city on that day, but will return with as much gold as will weigh a ton of coin." He left the Pennsylvania House on Saturday the 12th. On the 15th, at about 8 or 4 A. M., he came back to the same house and was there when he was hesitated about registering his name, but finally consented. The clerk was one who gave his name as Boyd. Thompson had the appearance of a laboring man. Early in the morning this man left, and shortly afterward Atzerott followed, and was not seen again.

Hezekiah Metz, of Montgomery County, testified that on the Sunday following the assassination Atzerott took dinner at his house. Some conversation took place about General Grant having been shot; it was understood that he had been shot on the cars. Atzerott said that if the man who was to have followed him had followed him it would have been so.

Sergeant G. W. Gemmill testified as to the circumstances of Atzerott's arrest at Germantown. He did not ask for the reason of his arrest.

On Thursday, the 20th, the first witness on the stand was A. R. Boteler, telegraph operator in Brooklyn. On the 23d of March Booth handed him the following message, which was sent to Washington:

"To—Wickham, Esq., 541 H Street, Washington, D. C.

"Tell John to telegraph number and street at once.

"NEW YORK, March 23, 1865.

Weichman was then recalled to the stand and testified that he resided in this district; that he was acquainted with was John Surratt; that upon asking the latter what was meant by the message said the street was Booth's. "Don't be so damned inquisitive." Weichman further testified that after Booth left, when he returned Surratt told him that day at 4 P. M. and went to his room, he rang the bell for Don, the colored servant, who told him that John had been out about half past two that afternoon with six others on horseback; that they were armed and equipped for service. Mrs. Surratt weighs distinctly, and asked her what was the matter. She replied: "Oh! don't ask me about the best of your dinner, John has gone away." About 6½ P. M. Surratt came home very much excited, and rushed immediately about the room with one of Sharp's revolvers in his hand. Weichman asked him why he was so much excited. Surratt replied: "I tell about say man who comes into this room, my head comes off, and my property is gone." "What is there something to do; can you get me a checkship?" Payne came into the room, and about fifteen minutes after he left Booth also came in, and rushed about as fractiously as the others had done. He had a whip in his hand, and walked three west into the second story, where they remained about twenty minutes. Subsequently, Weichman and Surratt where he had left Payne, and he said Payne had gone to Baltimore with a letter. That he (Payne) had afterward started, when passing by the door Surratt called out and asked if he was going to Surrattsville. Payne said he was, and Surratt told him to look sharp, as he had particular reasons. The letter was signed Wood (the name which Payne assumed), and the letter stated that he was at the Revere House, New York; that he was looking for situation, &c., but would prefer something in the boarding-house in Grand Street. Weichman had made a mention of Captain Gleason, of the Marine Department, with whom, as early as March, he conversed about the probable time the conspirators could be got.

J. J. McPhail testified that Atzerott had told him that the man who was in his room at the Kirkwood House belonged to Booth.

Washington Briscoe, on the night of the 14th of April, saw Atzerott get into a carpet car at Sixth Street between eleven and twelve o'clock and ride down to the depot. His role with him. Atzerott waited to sleep with him at his store, which was on the passage to the depot, for convenience, and Atzerott said he would return to the Pennsylvania House.

The Rev. W. H. Ryder, of Chicago, the next witness, went to Richmond on the 14th and arrived on the 15th. He picked up in the Capitol there the following paper:

"RICHMOND, February 11, 1865.

"His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States of America:

"When Isaac Johnson and myself waited upon you some days since, in relation to the project of annoying and harassing the enemy, by means of burning their shipping, towns, etc., etc., there were several remarks made by you, upon the subject, that I was not then at liberty to communicate, but which, upon subsequent conference with the parties proposing the enterprise, I find can safely be made known to the citizens:

"1st. To combustible material consists of several preparations, and not one alone, and can be used without exposing the party using them to the least danger of detection whatever. The preparations are not in the hands of Mr. Booth, but are in the hands of those who will be employed to burn and to him and one other party, as I understand.

"2d. You have no necessity for sending persons to Mr. Booth's house to obtain the enemy's papers, as the work may be done by agents, and in most cases by persons ignorant of the fact, and therefore innocent.

"I have seen enough of the effects that can be produced to satisfy me that there is most ample, reliable power in the parties engaged, and in others but very slight, we can be sure of, that will make this town a hell on earth for the United States troops. When you leave every transport that leaves the harbor of New York for Dixie must be supplied with supplies for the armies of the enemy in the South. Third. Burn every transport and steamer that you can find in Hampton Roads, and devastate the country and fill its people with terror and consternation.

"I am clear in this opinion that the Northern communities are as fully and thoroughly impressed with the conviction as I am, I believe we have only to make the command, if promptly appropriated and energetically applied, to overthrow the Northern people in a very short time. For the purpose of satisfying your mind on the subject, I respectfully but earnestly request that you will have an interview with General Hardie, formerly a member of Congress from Missouri, who, I think, will be conclusive proofs, to convince you that what I have suggested is perfectly feasible and practicable.

"The deep interest I feel for the success of our cause in this struggle, with the conviction of the importance of availing ourselves of every element of defense, must be my excuse for urging you and requesting you to have General Hardie to see you. If you should see proper to do so, I respectfully ask the favor that he will be conveyed for you to see him.

"I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"W. S. OLDHAM."

On the back of the letter are the two indorsements, the first being "Hon. W. S. Oldham, Richmond, February 15, 1865."

"In relation to plans and means of burning the enemy's shipping, towns, etc., preparations are in the hands of Colonel McCullough, and are shown to only one party. Ask the President to have an interview with General Hardie, formerly from Missouri, on the subject. Secretary of State at his convenience please see General Hardie, and learn what plan he has for overcoming the difficulty heretofore experienced. J. D. Feb. 15th, 1865.

"Secretary of War."

John Potts, Chief Clerk of the War Department, identified the signatures of "J. D." as Jefferson Davis's, of the Hon. Rice, who used to sign republican made by David when the latter was Secretary of War, also identified the writing.

Lieutenant Terry produced the following letter found in Booth's trunk after the assassination. The letter was directed to "J. C. Wilkes Booth, Esq., National Hotel, Washington, D. C.," and post-marked "Baltimore, Md., March 19":

"BOOTHWOOD, Saleb. Co., March 16, 1865.

"DEAR JOHN,—Was disappointed in your not coming that you could not remain in Baltimore until I saw you? I came to see you as I could not find that you had gone to Washington. I called also to see Mike, but learned from his mother that he was not at home, and had not returned. Mr. Ichabod Booth sends his good will to you. How long will you remain in town? Will call again to-morrow. Could not send a message by Mr. Booth, as I was in expectation for employment, an answer to which I shall receive in a few days. Will be glad to receive a line from you. Can I then, under existing circumstances, come to Washington? You know full well that I would not propose anything in going on there; therefore the subject. Please write me soon. Your sister Asia is not well at present doctor for various reasons, which if you look into you can readily see. Your sister Mary is very much interested. You know any one can consume me for my present. Will close, as I have no more to say, for now. Can come after telling them I had left you? Suspicion rests upon me now from my wife family, and every portion of the country. I will be compelled to leave home any how, and know not where to go. Will remain in for a few days.

THE TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.—[Sketched by Mr. Andrew M'Callum.]

INTERESTING ITEMS.

FREEDOM AND FASHION.—To the philosophic mind it is ever an amusement to contemplate the fanciful and fickle freaks of fashion. When hoops went out of vogue, only a century ago, the ladies vowed that canary petticoats were infinitely prettier; and they vied with one another in reducing their dimensions until their skirts became so slender they could hardly move their feet without the liveliest circumference. So, doubtless, will it be again, now crinoline is doomed. The millinery of Paris seems determined to make the "contour of the Empire" of some fifty seasons since, and who will dare dispute the sentence of the milliners? Already we are aware of the changes which is approaching. Leaflet fresh from Paris states that the tendency by upgarding is in the first sight we might fancy are their night-dresses. Of course, when one has little rest in all the female world will swim with it. Casting overboard their crinoline, the ladies will don the "Louis Quinze" which they had worn under a right course of blasting. Our wives will be so almost that we shall hardly know them; and when the walls will be their limp and scanty dresses we shall at first be scarcely able to recognize them in meeting the unmentioned shading of our shins. To the philosophic mind it will be curious to note what excuses will be made for the wearing of scant petticoats, to which the ladies have all vowed that they never could revert. The comfort has been was, said they, in wearing iron cages nobody could tell; and they pretended that they wore them under the full reason, and not for fashion's sake. The philosopher might shrug his shoulders, smile, and, slightly elevating his left eyebrow, quietly availed naught in its effort to refuse the circumference of petticoats, which had been fashion had expanded, and fashion only could contract. In its influence on the female mind, philosophy will but come in portion with fashion; and the philosopher who fancies that his wife will be blessed in when fashion decrees that hearing is no better than a fool.

THE STANDARD OF BEAUTY.—Slander twins are living in North Carolina, where they form a plantation. They married two sisters, and while they had few children each sister lived happily. When one of them, however, had a child it was always perverted and would not live under the same roof. The twins are now fifty years old. One of them is drooping, and appears to have been made to find out if the lig-ture that binds them were cut without any pain. Both are in good health. They are rich. Although all confess your beauty, and plead it "—ine, nobody seems to see you as your good but in" —ation, and we do not.

A WORD OR CLOCKS.—Ingenious men of all ages; from Archimedes, 20 years b.c., to Wallingford, at the commencement of the fourteenth century, have been clad on the inventors of the clock. The fact is, that the clock, like almost every other piece of mechanism, gradually grew to perfection: one man suggested wheel-work; another the weight for maintaining or driving power; another the balance for regulating the expenditure of that power; another his dial and hands; another the striking apparatus, and so on, as it last, one man combined all together in one machine, and gained the credit of having built the clock. This man appears to have been one Henry de Wick, or de Vick, the father of John, the tower of the palace of Charles the Fifth, about the year 1364, which clock is the most ancient of which there are any particular description. The principles upon which it was constructed were essentially the same as those of the clocks of the present day: that is, there was a moving power and a regulating power. The moving power was a weight hung by a cord, wound round a barrel; the unwinding of which, by the fall of the weight, gave motion to a train of wheels that moved the hands around the dial. The regulating power was a balance-wheel, and was made to vibrate backward and by the manner of the watch-balance, so familiar to us all.

A SECRET POISON.—Some person inventing a new mode and going into a cooler, or into the open air, should carefully close his ice in four sawdust, and by this means, as it were, acclimatized to the colder atmosphere, and breathe the change of the cold atoms, by which the cold air is made to traverse the long, warm nasal passage before it reaches the warm lungs and stomach, and its power would have being thus raised, one common mode of "catching cold" is avoided. Most people, upon leaving a warm church or hot concert-room, immediately open their mantle to disarm the sudden rush of cold air into the lungs, and many a severe cold is taken. It is equally common, but worse, for a public speaker or an actor in the throat is more heated from his recent exercises, and he may, and often does, become hoarse for a month by such apparently trifling neglect.

THE Peach was originally a poisonous almond. Its fleshy parts were used to poison arrows, and for this purpose introduced into Persia. The transplantations and cultivations, you say reversed its poisonous qualities, but produced the delicious fruit that we now enjoy.

A KISS is a little thing, and evanescent, but of potent influence. A lingering, tender kiss will feed the heart with joy more than the richest viands of wedding feast. It thrills up the sere spirit, and oft given, converts a doubtful into electromagnet. One of the most touching was the pauses of childhood. To women it is as necessary as the sunshine and dew to the rose. We refer not to the "strong-minded" of the sex, who, in their boasted independence, feel all the world is selfish enough within themselves, but to those gentle, domestic beings who make God home. A frequent, unforgiven kiss will bring down the sweetness which otherwise would turn to coldness and indifference.

BARON LIEBIG'S SOUP FOR CHILDREN.—With that remarkable estimation of the greatness of small things which is one of the characteristics of his many high intellectual qualities, and with a tender appreciation of the importance of small gradations, Baron Liebig has given a special study to the English scientific perfected to the description of a new article of diet which he considers to be the most valuable substitute for the natural nutriment for those children who are by accident deprived of their mother's milk. He has well known that a cow's milk does not adequately represent that of a human mother, and has endeavored therefore to add, as it is usually termed, to bring it nearer to it, although stand by nature. Having for the manufacture of this food, the cow's milk is first sugar in the stomach during digestion imparts an unusual quantity of sugar on the curdled milk, and by the addition of the starch he before-hand transformed into the soluble form of sugar and dextrine. This he effects by adding to the whole flour a certain quantity of malt. As wheaten flour contains a considerable chalk (the water's milk, he supplies that when preparing the soup. This "soup" may be shortly described as follows: Half an ounce of wheaten flour, and a certain equal quantity of malt flour, seven grains and a quarter of carbonate of potash, and a small ounce of water are well mixed; five ounces of cow's milk are then to be added, and the whole heated in a gentle fire: when the mixture begins to thicken it is removed from the fire, stirred during five minutes, and then strained. The bran will be thereby quite fluid, and finally used to boil. After the expiration of the time the starch is ready for use. By boiling it for a few minutes it loses all taste of the flour.

It is the greatest mistake in the world to suppose that glycerine is a costly article, yet it is a mistake that the mass of us are constantly committing. Many of us are accustomed to regard glycerine of the highest kind as an equal diamonds—in the light of rare jewels of the first water. Such things are only to be obtained by a tenth cuticy of money. But with this idea we are all more or less envious of wealth, believing that the possession enables an individual to compass the whole round of human enjoyments. There was upon a time a man who was wished he were a king, that he might be able to swing on a gate all day. That boy had a very modest idea of enjoyment, but if his wish had been granted he would soon have found a way of swinging on a gate and fallen tired of being immortal. It is a pity that we are not better than known in a more philosophic way, so we can not have our wish occasionally, and be convinced by experience that true happiness is to be in being either rich or great. There are many accepted pieces of verbal wisdom, handed down unreasoned by printing out the evils of riches and the curse of greatness. We subscribe to them, as a matter of inherited faith, believe in them; but practically they do not guide us. We sigh for riches and greatness all the same, still clinging to the notion that wealth and position can purchase enjoyment.

CHAPTER IX.

OLIMPIA COLONNA.

SAXON TREVALYAN did not fall in love at first sight, as Salamon fell in love with Emelie, walking in the garden "full of branches green." His heart was not taken by storm. It took grew none the brighter or the paler for that stolen contemplation. Nothing of the kind. He only thought her beautiful, felt a little embarrassed at her, and delighted to look upon her; just as he would have admired, and wondered at, and looked upon a gorgeous sunset, or a striking new native Alps, or a splendid meteor in a summer sky. He did not attempt to analyze her features. He did not even carefully note their color and her delicate nostrils quiver; but he could not help seeing how there was something haughty in the very undulations of her tall and slender figure, and something imperial in the character of her head. Saxon was not without a considerable of female loveliness. The women of the Grimsby are among the homeliest of their race, and till now he had never seen a pretty face, graceful, handsome, highly-bred woman was a phenomenon in his eyes, and he looked upon her with that kind of awe which is inspired by what is unexpected. The young man would, perhaps, have been surprised, and he would be surprised that expression upon his cousin's face, and even more astonished if he could have read the thrilling, cynical smile into which it gradually faded.

"Come, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, "we must taste this bottle of Château Margaux before we go."

Saxon shook his head.

"You have had only one glass," remonstrated his cousin.

"Thank you, I do not wish for more."

"Then you don't relish the wine after all."

"Yes, I do; but I am no longer thirsty. Sec I have almost emptied my glass without it."

Mr. Trefalden shrugged his shoulders.

"We are told," said he, "that primeval man passed his days in the open air, sustaining his life on he reached the era of civilization; namely, the stone period, the iron period, and the bronze. Well, I should not be surprised if the stone period; and Heaven only knows how long you might have staid there if I had not come to your aid! It is perhaps not too late even now."

Saxon laughed aloud. It was his way to laugh on the smallest provocation, like a joyous child, and Mr. Trefalden, finding no echo, another proof of barbarism.

"Will you come as much as you please, cousin William," he said; "but don't ask me to drink without thirst or eat without hunger."

"Come! shall we smoke a cigar in the garden before starting?"

"I am very sorry were leaving the room Mr. demoiselle Colonna rose and followed them.

"Mr. Trefalden," she said, eagerly. "Mr. Trefalden, we found letters awaiting us on our arrival, one of which demands an immediate answer. This answer must be conveyed to a certain Signor Colonna, a messenger. It may wait for various reasons, be sent through the post. Can you help me? Do you know of any person whom it would be safe to employ?"

"No, no," interrupted she. "It would not be prudent to consult him."

"Then I fear I am powerless."

"I—it is not very far," hesitated the lady. "He would only have to go about a mile beyond Thusis, on the Splugen road."

"If I were not a man of law, Mademoiselle Colonna," said Mr. Trefalden, with his blandest smile, "I would myself volunteer to be your envoy; but—"

"But you have given us your name, Mr. Trefalden, and can do no more. I understand that. I understood it from the first. I am only sorry to have troubled you."

"And I am sorry that you have not troubled me. I regret that I can not be of more service."

Whereupon Mr. Trefalden and Mademoiselle Colonna, made a sign to his cousin to follow him, and left the room. But Saxon lingered, blushing and irresolute, and turned to the lady instead.

"I can take the letter," he said, shyly. Mademoiselle Colonna paused, looked straight into his eyes, and said,

"It is an important letter. Can I trust you?"

"Yes."

"Can I safely trust you to give it into no other hands than those of the person whom I shall describe to you?"

"Yes."

"If any one else should try to take it from you, what would you do?"

"If a man should try to take it from me by force," replied Saxon, laughingly, "I should knock him down."

"But if he were stronger than you; or if there were several?"

He stopped to consider.

"Then I should take it out, as if I were going to give it up," said he, "and I would swallow it."

"Good."

Mademoiselle Colonna paused again, and again looked at him searchingly.

"Did you hear all that I said about this letter just now to Mr. Trefalden?" she said.

"Every word of it."

"You know that you must not repeat it?"

"I suppose so."

"And you know that to convey this letter may be—though it is very unlikely—a service of some little danger?"

"I do not know that; but I knew it was a service of responsibility."

"Well, then, are you equally willing to go?"

"Of course. Why not?"

Mademoiselle Colonna smiled, but somewhat distrustfully.

"I do not doubt your courage," she said; "but how am I to know that you will not betray my confidence?"

Saxon colored up to the roots of his hair and drew back a step.

"You can not give me the letter," said he, "if you are afraid to trust me. I can only promise to deliver it, and be silent."

Mademoiselle Colonna suddenly and joined them. He had his purse in his hand.

"Will you take it, young man?" he asked. "Will you swear this?"

"No," said Saxon, proudly, "I will not swear it. It is enough to take God's name for riches. I will give you my word of honor, but I will not take an oath."

Though it what reward do you expect?"

"Reward? What do you mean?"

"Will twenty francs satisfy you?"

Saxon drew back another step. He looked from Signor Colonna to his daughter, and from the lady's face to the gentleman's.

"Money!" he faltered. "You offer me money?"

"Is it not enough?"

Barbarian as he was, Saxon was quite sufficiently civilized to writhe under the sting of this affront. The hand of Saxon to his honest eyes. It was the first humiliation he had known in his life, and he felt it bitterly.

"I will deliver the sorry your letter for hire," said he, in a hurried, quivering voice. "I would have gone twice the distance to—to please and serve you. I am ashamed of you."

And, turning abruptly on his heel, the young man strode out of the room.

"Oh, stay, monsieur, one moment—one moment only!" cried Mademoiselle Colonna.

But he was gone already.

"What is this? Who is he? What does it all mean?" asked Signor Colonna, impatiently.

"It means, papa, that we have committed a grievous error," replied his daughter. "He is a gentleman—a gentleman, and I took him for a commissionaire. There he goes, through the garden gate—go to him; pray go to him, and apologize in my name and your own."

"Bah, my child, bah!" replied Colonna, nervously. "how can you be sure—"

"I am sure. I see it all now—I ought to have seen it from the first. But look yonder, and convince yourself! Mr. Trefalden has taken his arm from the down through the trees! Pray go—go at once, or you will be too late!"

Signor Colonna snatched up his hat and went at once; but he was too late for all that. The garden was a very perplexing place. It belonged, next to the hotel, but to the Château Planta close by, and was entered by a large iron gate, some few yards down the road. It was laid out on a little promontory that extends just at the junction of the Hinter and Vorder Rhines, and was traversed by all kinds of winding walks, some of which led down to the water side, some up to shady nooks, or hidden summer-houses, or open lawns fragrant with violets, and musical with ever-playing fountains. Up and down, in and out of these paths, Signor Colonna wandered for nearly half an hour without meeting a living soul, or hearing any sound but the rushing of the rivers and the colors of his own steps on the gravel. Saxon and his cousin had disappeared as utterly as if the green sward had opened and swallowed them, or the gray Rhine had swept them away in its eddying current.

CHAPTER X.

MENTOR BEGINS TO TAKE TELEMACHUS IN HAND.

PASTOR MARTIN never closed his eyes in sleep that night after William Trefalden paid his first visit at the Château Rotzberg. His anxieties had been increasing and multiplying of late, and this event brought them en masse to the surface. He scarcely knew whether to feel relieved or embarrassed by the arrival of his London kinsman. Harassed as his mind had been for some time past, he yet dreaded to lay the sources of his troubles before an arbiter who might tell him that he had acted unwisely. Yet here was the arbiter, dropped, as it were, from the clouds; and, be his verdict what it might, the agony of Saxon's education could not be withheld from him. The pastor's priest shrunk from this confession. It was true that he had done all for the best. It was also true that he would have given his own life to make that boy a good and happy man. And yet—and yet there remained the fatal possibility which had so haunted him during these last few months. His own judgment might all this time have been at fault; and the fair edifice which he had been building up with such love and devotion for the last twenty years or more, might, after all, have its foundations in the sand. This was a terrible thought, and so hard to bear that the pastor made up his mind to go down to Reichenau early in the morning and talk the whole matter over with William Trefalden before he and Saxon should have started for Chur. When the morning came, however, a new fear was missing from the clock. This mischance threw all the farm-work out of its daily course, so that the pastor started a good half hour late, and, quite expecting to meet them both gone by the time he reached the Adler.

But he found Saxon and Mr. Trefalden in his cousin in the garden of the Château Planta.

"Well," said Mr. Trefalden, "I began to think you were not coming. Take a cigar?"

Saxon shook his head.

"I don't smoke, thank you," said he, hurriedly. "Pray, sir, forgive—"

Mr. Trefalden noted the flush upon his cheek, and the agitation of his manner, and followed in silence.

The young man plunged down a labyrinth of narrow sidewalks till they came to one that sloped to water side. At the bottom of this slope only a wire fence and a slip of gravelly beach lay between them and the river. A covered bridge spanned the stream a few yards higher up, and beyond the bridge lay the meadows and little mountains. Saxon, after pausing to touch the wire with his hand, sprang lightly over. Mr. Trefalden, less lightly, and more leisurely, followed his example. For a few minutes more they had both passed through the gloom of the covered bridge and emerged into the sunshine beyond. Saxon at once struck across the road and took the field-path opposite.

"Is this the way to Chur?" asked Mr. Trefalden, somewhat abruptly.

Saxon started and stopped.

"No, indeed," he replied. "I—I had forgotten. We must turn back."

"Not till I have finished my cigar. See—here is a shady bank and an old parapet wall that looks as if it had been felled on purpose. Let us sit and chat quietly for half an hour."

"With all my heart," said Saxon. So they sat down side by side, far enough out of sight or hearing of the public road, in which Signor Colonna was searching for them on the opposite side of the river.

"Well, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, "and how do you like Reichenau?"

"Heaven forbid that I should ever know any of the three," observed Saxon, gravely.

"You have this very day been in danger of the two last," replied Mr. Trefalden.

"Cousin, you are jesting."

"Cousin, I am doing nothing of the kind." Saxon's blue eyes opened in amazement.

"What can you mean?" said he.

"I will tell you. But you must promise to listen patiently, for my explanation involves some amount of detail."

Saxon bent his head; and the lawyer, puffing lazily at his cigar from time to time, continued.

"The Colonna family," said he, "is, as of course you know already, one of the oldest and noblest of the princely Roman houses. Giulio Colonna, whom you saw just now at the Adler, is a scion of the stock. He has been an enthusiast all his life. In his youth he married for love; and, for the last twenty or thirty years, has devoted himself, heart and soul, to Italian politics. He has written many pamphlets, and spioned more plots, than any man in Europe. He is at the bottom of every Italian conspiracy. He is at the head of every secret society that has Italian unity for its object. He is, in short, a born agitator; and his daughter is as fanatical as himself. As you saw them just now, so they are always. He with his head full of plots, and his pockets full of pamphlets—she exercising all her woman's wit and energy to enlist or utilize an ally."

I understand now what she meant by the 'good cause,'" observed Saxon, thoughtfully.

"Ay, that's the hackneyed phrase."

Saxon looked up.

"But it is a good cause," said he. "It is the liberty of her country."

Mr. Trefalden shrugged his shoulders.

"Yes, yes, of course it is," he replied; "but one gets very sick of this pamphleteering and plotting. Fighting is one thing, Saxon, and intriguing another. Besides, I hate a female politician."

"She is very beautiful," said Saxon.

"She is beautiful, and brilliant, and very fascinating; and she knows how to employ her power, too. Those eyes of Olimpia Colonna's have raised more volunteers for Italy than her father's pamphlets. Countless now, would you have been so ready to carry that letter this morning if the lady had worn blue spectacles and a front?"

"I can not tell; but I fear not," replied the young man, laughing. "But what has this to do with the fetters?"

"Every thing. Granted, now, that the fair signora had given you very unequivocal—"

"I suppose she took me for your servant," interposed Saxon, somewhat bitterly.

"—and that you had really taken charge of that paper grenade," continued Mr. Trefalden, "can you not guess what the results might have been? Well, I can. She would not have offered you money—not a sou—but she would have smiled upon you, and given you a kiss at parting; and you would probably have kissed it as if she had been an empress, and worshiped her as if she were a divinity; and your head, my dear Saxon, would have been as irretrievably turned as the heads of the false prophets in Julian's fourth circle."

"No, that it would not," said Saxon, hastily, with his face all on fire again at the suggestion.

"And, besides, the false prophets were in the eighth circle, cousin—the place, you know, called Maleboldge."

"True—the eighth. Thank you. Then you would have placed the grenade in whichever pocket lay nearest to the place where you were used to be; and you would have gone to the world's end as readily as to Thusis; and have been abjectly happy to wear Mademoiselle Colonna's fetters of flowers for the rest of your natural life."

"Nay, but indeed—"

"So much for the flowers," interrupted Mr. Trefalden. "Now for the iron. You have marked in this 'good cause,' there would have been no hope for you in the future. In less than a month you would have been involved in some secret society. Dwelling, as you do, on the high-road to Italy, you would have been appointed to all kinds of dangerous services; and the result of the whole affair would have been an Austrian dungeon, whence not even Santa Olimpia herself would have power to extricate you."

"A very pleasant picture, and very well painted," said Saxon, with an angry quiver of the lip, "but an error, cousin, from beginning to end. I should have ceased myself neither to the lady nor the cause; so your argument falls to the ground, and the fetters along with it."

Mr. Trefalden had too much tact to pursue the conversation further, so he changed the subject.

"Are you fond of music?" he asked.

"Passionately."

"Do you play any instrument?"

"I play a little on our chapel organ, but very badly."

"By ear, I suppose?"

"Not entirely. My father learned music at Geneva, in his youth; and all that he knows he has taught me."

"Which, I suppose," said Mr. Trefalden, "is just enough to make you wish it were more?"

"Precisely."

"Have you a good organ at the chapel?"

"No, a wretched thing. It is very small, very old, and sadly out of repair. Two of the stops are quite useless, and there are but five altogether."

"A wretched thing, indeed! Can't you get a new one?"

"I fear not. Perhaps when Count Plants comes back from Italy he may give us one. My father means to mention it to him, at all events; but then the count is always either in Naples or Paris. He may not come to Reichenau for the next three or four years."

"And in the mean while," said Mr. Trefalden, "the organ may die of old age, and become altogether dumb."

"Quite true," replied Saxon, with a sigh.

Mr. Trefalden glanced at him sharply, and a silence of some moments ensued.

"Don't you think, Saxon," said he, at length, "that it must be very pleasant to be rich?"

Saxon looked up from his reverie and smiled.

"To be rich!" he repeated.

"Ay—as Count Plants, for instance."

"Are you serious, cousin?"

"Quite serious."

"Then I think it can not be pleasant at all."

"Why not?"

"Because wealth is power, and power is a frightful temptation."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Trefalden.

"And a frightful responsibility, too."

"Nonsense again."

"All history proves it," said Saxon, earnestly.

"Look at Athens and Rome—see how luxury undermined the liberty of the one, and how the desire of aggrandizement—"

Mr. Trefalden laid his hand laughingly upon the young man's mouth.

"My dear cousin," said he, "you talk like a class-book or an Exeter Hall lecturer! Who cares about Rome or Athens now? One would think you were a thousand years old at the very least."

"But—"

"But your arguments are very true, and classical, and didactic—I grant all that. Nevertheless our dear Saxons require money to be comfortably agreeable thing. You, I think, are rather proud of your poverty."

"I am not ashamed of it," replied Saxon. "I have all that I need. An emperor can have no more."

"Hmph! Are there no poor in Reichenau?"

"None who are very poor. None so poor as the people of Embs."

"Where is Embs?"

"About half-way on the road to Chur. It is a Roman Catholic parish, and the inhabitants are miserably squalid and idle."

"I remember the place. I passed it on my way here yesterday. It looked like a hot-bed of fever."

"And well it might," replied Saxon, sadly. "They had it terribly last autumn."

Mr. Trefalden rose, and walked suddenly, leaning on his elbow, and flung away the end of his cigar.

"And so you think, young man," said he, "that because you have all you need, money would be of no use to you? Pray, did it never occur to you that you might relieve your wretches wanted food, medicine, and clothing?"

"We—we did what we could, cousin," replied Saxon, in a troubled voice. "God knows it was very little, but—"

"But if you had been a rich man you could have done far more than that. Is it not true?"

"True."

"Your religion enjoins you to give alms; but how are you to do this without money?"

"One may do good works without money," said Saxon.

"In a very limited degree. Not one-tenth part as many as if you had plenty of it. Did you never feel, in that side of the question, Saxon? Did you never wish to be rich for the sake of others?"

"I am not sure, but I do not think I ever did. I was so impressed with the belief that money was the root of all evil—"

"Pshaw! Things are good or evil according to the use we make of them. A knife is but a knife whether it be held by a surgeon or an assassin; yet the result is considerably different. You must divest your mind of these fallacies, Saxon. They are unworthy of you!"

Saxon put his hand to his brow uneasily.

"What you say sounds like the truth," said he; "and yet—and yet it is at variance with the precepts upon which I have relied all my life."

"Very possibly," replied Mr. Trefalden. "Precepts, however, are bad things to depend upon. They are made of India rubber, and will stretch to cover any proposition. Let us suppose now that you were a rich man—"

"How absurd!" said Saxon, forcing a smile. "What is the use of it?"

"We will see what might have been the use of it. In the first place, you would have had good instruction, and have become an accomplished musician. You would have enriched yonder little church with a fine organ, and perhaps have rebuilt the church into the bargain. You would have furnished the poor sufferers of Embs with a staff of doctors and nurses, and have saved, perhaps, scores of human lives. You would have been able to surround your uncle with comforts in his old age. You could have gratified your desire of visiting Rome, Athens, and Jerusalem. You could have lined the chateaux from top to bottom with Greek and Latin poets, and have founded a museum of Etruscan antiquities for your uncle's perpetual delight. Finally—"

He paused. Saxon looked up.

"Well, cousin," said he, "finally what?"

"Finally, rich men do not wear gray blouses and leather gaiters. If you had had a coat like mine on your back this morning, Saxon, Mademoiselle Colonna would not have taken you for a common peasant, and Signor Colonna would not have offered you money."

Saxon sprang to his feet with an impatient gesture.

"Enough of would be, and might be!" exclaimed he. "Of what use are these speculations? I am not rich, and I never shall be rich; so it is idle to think of it."

"At all events," persisted Mr. Trefalden, "you admit the desirableness of wealth."

"I—I am not sure. I can not relinquish an old belief so hastily."

"Not even in favor of the truth?"

"I do not yet know that it is the truth. My mind needs further evidence."

"Of what, my son?" said a gentle voice close behind him.

It was the pastor. There was a field-path across those very meadows between Rotberg and Reichenau, and the pine-trunk where the cousins had said to rest lay within a dozen yards of its course.

Saxon uttered a joyous exclamation.

"This is fortunate!" cried he. "You come at the right moment, father, to judge our argument."

"We were talking of riches," said Mr. Trefalden, rising, and grasping the old man's outstretched hand. "My young kinsman here preaches the language of an Arcadian, and declaims against the precious metals like a second Timon. I, on the other hand, have been trying to convince him that gold has a very bright side, indeed, and may be made to perform a good many wise offices. What say you?"

The pastor looked distressed.

"The question is a broad one," said he, "and there is much truth on both sides of it. But we can not discuss it now. I want to talk to you, cousin William. I have hastened down from Rotberg, fearing all the time lest I should miss you. Were you not going to Chur?"

"We were going, and are going, by-and-by," replied Mr. Trefalden.

"Can you spare me half an hour before you start?"

"The whole day, if you please."

"Nay, an hour will be more than enough. Saxon, that which I have to say to our cousin is not for thy ears. Go up, my son, to Tamins, and inquire about that Indian corn-seed that farmer Retschel promised us last week."

Saxon looked surprised; but prepared to be gone without a word.

"Shall I come back here afterward?" he asked.

"No. It would be better to await thy cousin at the Adler."

Saxon colored, and hesitated.

"Could I not wait at the chapel?" said he.

"Ay, at the chapel, if thou wilt."

So the young man waved a cheery farewell, and started at once upon his uncle's errand. Looking back presently, at the turn of the path, he saw them sitting on the pine-trunk, side by side, already in earnest conversation. He saw Mr. Trefalden shake his head. He fancied there was some kind of trouble in the old man's attitude. What could his uncle have to say to one whom, kinsman though he was, he had never seen till the previous evening? Why this mystery about their conversation? It was very strange. Saxon could not help feeling that he must be himself concerned, somehow or another, in the matter; and this surmise added, vaguely, to his uneasiness.

MR. Partington, being told that the family of Artaban Lincoln came originally from England, remembered that she had heard of "Old Tom of Lincoln," and, adopting her verdant specialties with great solemnity, suggested that Abraham's "prophisy" might have been "Old Tom."

"I have known many tribes," at the man said who had been convicted sixteen times for petty larceny.

"I'm sitting on the style, Mary," as the envious girl said, when she plumped down on her sister's new hat and bonnet.

POWER OF TALK.—A man recently broke off a marriage because the lady did not possess good conversational powers. A wicked editor, commenting upon the fact, says: "He should have married her, and then refused her a new bonnet, to have developed her power of talk."

A BURNING SHAME.—The Pinsylte candles.

PARTICULAR NOTICE.—The following parties are respectfully requested not to attend any of our places of public amusement: The man who will the cracking locks. The woman with the cough. The man who insists upon procuring a better seat for the ladies under his escort. The person who can not refrain from audible criticisms on the looks of the actors. The man who carries nuts. The man who laughs in the wrong place. The man who goes out half a dozen times during the play to maintain his chair. The fast young lady who is constantly leveling her opera-glass at the "fifters."

THE GREAT EX-GRAVER.—Death.

Why are scandal-mongers in one danger of bankruptcy than any other class?—Because they give no credit to any body.

A COW FOR THE FOX-HUNTER.—Why is the running of a fox like the careful perusal of a book?—Because it goes from cover to cover.

HOOP IT!—We see it announced that a joint-stock company is in progress of formation to promote the art of, and cultivate a taste for nicotation. We should recommend them to invest their capital in pipes and snap-nots, for there is no accusation so likely to prosper a joint-stock company as the congenial employment of blowing bubbles!

AT one of the last sittings of the Court of Assizes, Paris, the President made the following observation: "I see here several advocates with tresses of unusual length. For the day it is well, but henceforth the practice must be discontinued."

"THEY BORE HIM HOME."—Prince Napoleon has been to inspect the tunnel which is being carried through Mont Cenis. If we are to accept the opinion of the French Senate, nobody ought to be more self-conscious of what a bore he should be than His Imperial Highness Plon-Plon.

Why can not two slender persons ever become great friends?—Because they will always be slight acquaintance.

Generosity does not consist in giving; but in making some sacrifice to enable one to give.

FUNERAL FURNISHERS.—Doctors.

Why is a lady's belt like a scavenger?—Because it goes round and gathers up the sofal.

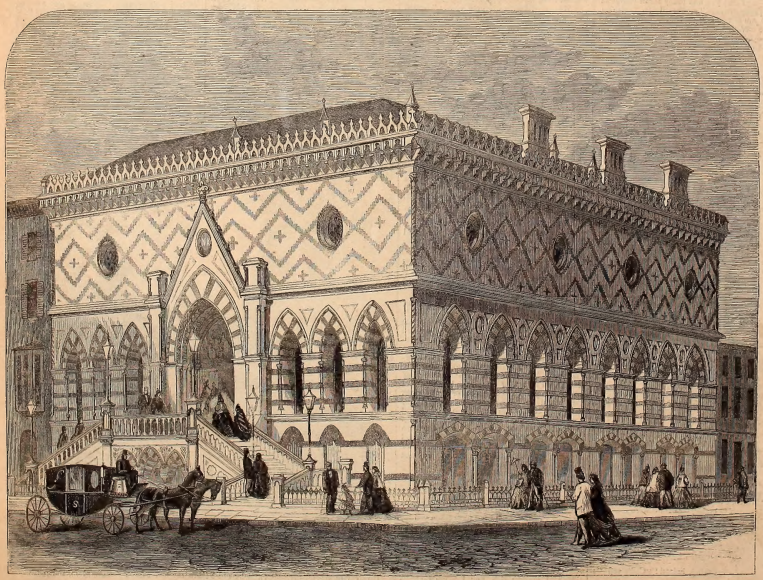
THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.



THE building of the National Academy of Design is a beautiful Temple of Art. It went up in the years of angry strife, but at the time of its dedication the time of peace was almost fully come. The building is well situated on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, and was built according to the design of P. B. WIGHT. Built of white marble, it bears some resemblance to the Doge's Palace in Venice, though different in color and proportions. The marble is covered with elaborate ornamentation, and the building certainly offers a great contrast to any other of our public edifices. It is spacious, solid, convenient, simple in arrangement, ample in accommodation, and very beautiful and effective. It was opened on Thursday evening, April 27, 1865. The gay groups ascending and descending the Grand Staircase, of which we give an illustration, afforded a splendid spectacle. We shall not be surprised if the revolutionary era through which we are passing gives an extraordinary impulse to progress in Art as well as in Literature.

ARRANDALE & CO. have purchased the entire stock of the late firm of Hall, Downing & Co., of Broadway, New York, announce that all of the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar Each.

In consequence of the great stagnation of trade in the manufacturing districts of New England, thereby causing the cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry has been provided for the Gift Sale, which has been sent off for sale in this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the parties with European Manufacturers, have received upon a Great Gift Appointment, to be sold for One Dollar Each, the following list of goods:

Certificates of the various articles are put into envelopes and thoroughly mixed up, and, when ordered, are sent out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus showing no favoritism. On receipt of the certificate you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may thus obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring, or any set of Jewelry on our list for One Dollar.

Send 25 cents for Certificate.

In all transactions by mail we shall charge for forwarding the certificate, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; twenty-five for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A new opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, cloths, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. ARRANDALE & Co., 707 Broadway. They have an immense stock of articles, varying in value, and all are to be sold for one dollar each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, forwarded to an envelope, and are required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with it. Articles are frequently obtained far worth more than the amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of investing a dollar.—Evening Post, New York, May 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be every way worthy of public confidence.—N. Y. Journal of American Journal, June 11, 1864.

We have inspected at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for European Manufacturing Jewelers, a large assortment of the most fashionable jewelry of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver plated and ambrotype ware, all of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, for the benefit of the manufacturers, who desire immediate employment to agents. We suggest this method to our readers as a very safe and honorable way of public endeavor, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement in this issue.—Sun, Sept. 3, 1864.

By Messrs. Arrandale & Co.'s arrangement the advantage must be on the side of the customer, for he has every chance to get a valuable article comparatively to him. We know what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he does not choose.—Evening Mail, Aug. 6, 1864.

Advertisement for Ladies.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., 707 Broadway. Persons in Gents & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in the business, and is filling her own pockets, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold certificates by the way. Call on them for particulars of terms. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—N. Y. Sunday Mercury, June 12, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement from Messrs. Arrandale & Co., dealers in watches, jewelry, and silverware. In payment of that advertisement we received several specimens of their advertised goods, and are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just what they had been represented.—True Democrat (Lexington, Argyle), Nov. 1, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., say, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our leading merchants has been at the office of Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some twenty articles, which he had drawn by chance, to the office for inspection, and without hesitation we can state that each and every one of the articles were of the value represented to the recipients, and none of them six times.

We have seen some very nice quality specimens of Table and Tea Spoons, Gold Watches, Ladies' Chains, Pins, Bracelets, etc., which have been sent by Arrandale & Co. to their prizes for $1 each.—Anglican Reporter, N. Y. State, Feb. 15, 1865.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and country in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, which must be remittances amount to one Dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 10 cents to us, the rest in cash or postage stamps.

United States 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES, $230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscription.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already issued, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-Thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and continuously after that date.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES will in no way affect the interest of the purchaser in gold, if made; will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $200,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. The amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will be undoubtedly at a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that readers of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

PINEAPPLE CIDER.

DR. TALBOT'S CONCENTRATED MEDICAL PINEAPPLE CIDER is a preventive of sickness.

The experience that Dr. Talbot has had for the last 25 years convinces him that it is time the public had an article offered that will prevent sickness. The article offered is Dr. Talbot's MEDICATED PINEAPPLE CIDER, designed for all classes.

Old and Young. It is not new to the Doctor, but it is entirely new to the public. One quart bottle will last a well person a year. This is rather a new mode of doctoring; nevertheless it will Save Millions from being sick. Is it not better to pay three dollars a year for keep from being sick than to pay ten or twenty dollars in doctors' bills, and as much more for the loss of time and the inconvenience of being sick? To prevent sickness, use as directed

Add one teaspoonful of Dr. Talbot's Pineapple Cider to a tumbler of cold water, and drink the first thing after you get up. Repeat the dose at 12 o'clock and at 7 o'clock at night. It will increase the strength, and give

Vigor and Action to the system. A celebrated New York merchant, who has made a thorough trial of the Pineapple Cider, assures Dr. Talbot that he has gained nine pounds of flesh in one month at the first trial. He continues to use and recommend it, and finds it very beneficial as it has proved an entire Preventive to Sickness in his case. Also another well-known gentleman in New York has used the Cider about the same length of time, and has not been sick one day during that time.

This Wonderful Preparation will increase the strength, give vigor and action to the system, and prevent sickness. It has been tested in every variety of all kinds—Bilious Colic, Diarrhœa, Diseases of the Throat, Acute in the Stomach, Dyspepsia, Nausea, Rheumatic Pains, Dyspepsia, Acidity of the Stomach, etc., etc., —in short, and the quieting effect on the system is truly astonishing.

Dr. Watson, an eminent physician, used it with great success in treating Fevers, Dyspepsia, Nervous Affections, Loss of Appetite, Weakness, Pain in the Head, Bilious Chronic Diarrhœa, Colic, Dysentery, and Diseases of the Stomach and Bowels. It is also particularly recommended by physicians to delicate females, and as an excellent remedy for Disordered Digestion, Want of Appetite, Languor, Nephritic Affections, Rheumatism, etc., etc. It never fails to relieve Nervous Tremor, Wakefulness, Disturbed Sleep, etc. American ladies have used this article with great success to heighten their color in Pallid Cases.

It imparts a cheerfulness to the disposition, and brilliancy to the countenance.

To travelers, especially, it is of inestimable value, and should be provided with a bottle of it before starting, for which the water is likely to vary in quality and tendency.

Dr. Talbot's Pineapple Cider is prepared with care, and with the utmost confidence as a timely, efficacious restorative.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IX.—No. 441.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

THE GRAND REVIEW AT WASHINGTON—GENERAL MEADE AND STAFF PASSING THE PRINCIPAL STAND, MAY 23, 1865.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1865.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR AND GENERAL SHERMAN.

WITH the exception of President LINCOLN'S last inaugurate, no one in the nation has done more for the suppression of the rebellion than Mr. STANTON and General SHERMAN, and every good citizen sees with regret that efforts are made to aggravate a personal misunderstanding between them into a serious difference. We are very sure that a little calm reflection will show each of those gentlemen and their friends that each of them have some reason for annoyance, but that neither has any cause for bitter hostility toward the other.

General SHERMAN'S military services were so illustrious and important; he had directed with such consummate skill operations so extensive and conclusive; he had added such renown to the arms of the United States, and had turned to such signal dismay the sneering skepticism of our enemies, that it was incumbent upon the Government to guard his fame even against himself, to interpret any incomprehensible action kindly, and not even to appear to doubt the perfect purity of so faithful an officer. Indeed his conduct in relation to the extraordinary convention—the fact that he did not assume, except in the matter of the armistice, to act independently—that he sent a confidential officer to Fortress Monroe to lay the convention before the Government and to receive its decision, might justly have led him to expect that if his course were disapproved, the disapproval would have been quietly and instantly communicated to him and not published to the country, exposing him to injurious criticism and suspicion.

So much may fairly be said for General SHERMAN; and in ordinary times, and at almost any other moment of the war, such would doubtless have been the course of the Government.

But, on the other hand, was it surprising, ought it to astonish General SHERMAN when he reviews all the circumstances, that Mr. STANTON should have been confounded at receiving the news of so inexplicable an act as so critical a moment in the history of the late formidable rebellion unburied. The country was quivering with wrath at his murder, and at the final proof it furnished of the ghastly spirit of the rebellion. Doubt, suspicion, dismay, were universal in every side; and in the very crisis of the painful excitement came the tidings of a convention with the military chief that in fact was a political intercourse with the rebel leaders, which distinctly recognized the rebel authority by referring the agreement for ratification, not to the Government of the United States, but also to the men called the Confederate Government; while in his address to his army General SHERMAN spoke of the convention as made not only with General JOHNSTON, but with other "high officials"—meaning, of course, civil authorities of some kind. His convention also established an armistice, and this after the short, final campaign before Petersburg, in which SHERMAN'S superior officer had refused any delay to JOHNSTON'S surrender, and had in fact been angry with him while he corresponded. The armistice was also in direct opposition to the unvarying policy of President LINCOLN'S administration, never to acknowledge his rebels as lawful belligerents whatever action the necessity of any particular case, such as the exchange of prisoners, might impose; and when the President's message went to Hampton Roads to meet the rebel agents seeking peace, he expressly told General GRANT not to suspend his military operations for an hour. The effect of the convention, then, were inexplicable after the fall of Richmond and the rout and surrender of LEE.

The convention, moreover, was made by General SHERMAN, and it is undeniable that, from all he had written during his magnificent campaign, it was evident that, with all his military genius and success, he did not fully comprehended the scope of the war as it was understood by the Government and the people. He had treated it merely as a military question, and it was a great deal more. How just this impression of his want of sympathy with the real struggle was, is now apparent from his letter to General JOHNSTON, written while the secession of the convention was still pending, in which he speaks of the debates upon slavery as "the senseless discussions which have kept us all in hot water for fifty years!"

Now certainly such a convention made at such a time by a commander holding such views must have profoundly startled the Government. That it could be kept altogether secret was impossible. In the opinion of the Government, therefore, it was imperatively necessary to obviate the effect of its fragmentary publication, of the painful and exaggerated rumors which were sure to attend it, by officially announcing it, and accompanying the announcement with an emphatic repudiation of the act, and a final assurance of harmony and tranquility by the departure of the Lieutenant-General to the headquarters of General SHERMAN.

That the action of the Government was altogether discreet we do not say. But if the General complains of it, ought he not to ask himself whether his own part in the transaction was judicious? Ought he not to understand that while the country will forever proudly cherish his great services, it does not count his connection with JOHNSTON among them; and that if Mr. STANTON expressed the national surprise and disapproval in an unfortunate manner, that surprise and disapprobation were very deeply and universally felt. That a difference so readily comprehended, and which involves neither the ability nor the patriotism of the Secretary or the General, should degenerate into a personal quarrel by the action of either, is something so gravely to be deplored that we shall refuse to believe it possible.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE OLD CONSTITUTION.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON has issued his proclamation defining the terms upon which the Government of the State of North Carolina is to be reorganized. He has appointed Mr. W. W. HOLDEN Provisional Governor, and he has prescribed the qualifications of electors in the reorganizing convention. Those qualifications are loyalty and complexion. The voters under the old State Constitution who take the oath provided are, politically speaking, to be considered the people of the State.

This act of the National Government very properly and completely recognizes the fact that there is at present no political authority in the State of North Carolina but that which the Government by permitting certain relations chooses to acknowledge. The loyal white citizens of the State are admitted to vote not because the State authorities them, but because the United States permits them. The United States intervenes and requires a condition unknown to the State. And the same power had the same right to require any condition it chose. The question was how far the Government should intervene, what conditions it should demand.

The President evidently wishes to act in the spirit of our system, which has allowed States to settle the question of suffrage. It is perfectly true that the Constitution of the United States confers the power upon each State alone to determine who shall be voters? But it seems to us that the President hardly remembers that he is now deciding the vital point, namely, who are to be considered the people of the State? He expressly excepts some who are so considered by the late State Constitution. He has the same right to except others. But he would certainly not have violated the spirit of the National or the late State Constitution, if he had remembered that the whole number of freemen was the true basis of representation, and had therefore ordered an enrollment of all the adult male population as the constitutional "people" of the State.

The precedent of this proclamation will doubtless be followed in Georgia and other States. The question will then reappear in Congress when the representatives elected and elected by a State so reorganized shall claim their seats. Whether Congress will recognize as republican the action of a State Government or Government founded upon a small minority of the adult male population, we may be permitted to doubt. We confess that we should be better pleased with the plan by which North Carolina is to be reorganized, if it did not receive such unqualified commendation from those who have most savagely denounced President JOHNSON, and who now have a very ill-disguised sympathy with the insurrection of State Sovereignty against the Union.

SHALL WE PAY OFF THE NATIONAL DEBT?

A good many people have been reminded during the past week of Falstaff's praise of a spendthrift dragged to jail with "A Plan for paying off the National Debt" sticking out of his pocket. For it has not only been gravely proposed in some of our journals that a few of the rich men club together to the number of 150,000 or thereabouts, and contribute $20,000 each to extinguish our national debt, but a scheme for each of the rich men aforesaid have actually promised in writing to perform their share of the undertaking provided only that the other 149,980 or thereabouts of their likewise rich men of 2 million of dollars have already been secured, leaving only the trifle of $2,999,000,000 still to be subscribed. That this amount will be shortly forthcoming is clear; for a subscription obtains a first-rate notice in the newspapers—no slight advantage, now that trade is reviving—and involves no appreciable pecuniary risk. It would not be surprising if, by active canvassing, as much as $10,000,000 were secured—on paper; and then, of course, with only $2,999,000,000 to collect, the way to the extinction of the debt would be clear. Rich men in all countries are so prone to pay other people's debts, and our rich men so given to invest their means on sentimental principles, that the success of the scheme is assumed to be beyond question. When it succeeds we shall owe a statue of brass to the brilliant genius who suggested it, and to the appreciative journals which fostered it to maturity.

If, however, it should chance to fail—and, it must be remembered, most deserving and plausible enterprises will fail sometimes—it may leave behind it a resilution not unworthy of serious thought.

Twice before in the history of this country a national debt was forced upon us by war. Each time it was paid off. In each case peace led to retrenched expenditure, increased revenue, and consequently to rapid extinction and at last comparative extinction of indebtedness. For the third time war has bequeathed us a debt—this time much vaster than any previously incurred or dreamed of. The question arises, shall we follow American precedent, and go to work to pay off this debt as we paid off the debts of the Revolution of 1812–'14; or shall we follow the European precedent, and content ourselves with paying the interest regularly, leaving the principal practically irredeemable?

There is a certain prejudice in political economy than this, that a man can not invest his money better than in paying his debts. Now the national debt is the debt of all of us. Every man is bound, in person and property, to pay his share of it. Every foot of land in the country is mortgaged for the payment of the interest, and, if necessary, at muster for the creditors, will enforce the mortgage inexorably. Every dollar's worth of property we have, real and personal, is liable to be seized and sold to pay that interest. If this incumbrance on our property had been created in consequence of some accidental personal liability—the failure of a debtor, the loss of a cargo, unsuccessful speculations, or the like—the impulse of every sound and careful person would be to go to work to pay it off, or to sell an unincumbered real estate to his heirs. Many might be unable to do this. But all would like to do it, and nearly all would try. Is there any reason why individuals should feel differently with their share of the national debt?

It is urged that posterity will benefit by the results of the war, and ought therefore to bear its share of the debt. We don't affect much concern for posterity, and think it may be left to look out for itself. The question is, whether it is better for this generation to go on paying taxes at the rate of two or three hundred millions a year, or to make an effort and, by a present sacrifice, get rid of them altogether.

The late Mr. GALLATIN, one of the best friends this country ever had, described our Congressional financiers as Bourbons who had learned nothing from experience. And certainly the Internal Revenue law is worthy of legislators who had never heard of such a thing as a system of taxation. It seems to combine every possible defect, and to be productive. The fiscal year it only yielded $102,000,000, and we doubt, after all that has been said, whether it will yield $200,000,000 for the next year. It monstrously oppressive upon some localities and some branches of trade and industry, while others escape altogether. And it is so cumbrous and complicated that while it opens the door to vast frauds, the expense of collection will probably exceed 12½ per cent. These statements will, of course be denied by officials. But let us wait till we get the returns. It will be urged that the law is to be amended, and that a commission has been appointed for the purpose of proposing improvements. No doubt of it. If the system lasts so long we may rely on the law being altered at every session of Congress for the next quarter of a century. It may be altered too. But that a revenue law will be passed which shall not be unfairly oppressive on this or that class, and shall at the same time be productive, and can be administered honestly and for a reasonable cost, is what no man can believe who realizes the vast diversity of interests existing and to be created by the vast area from the Rio Grande to the great Lakes, and from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and who possesses the least knowledge of the past administration of the custom-house and the internal system in this country. There will be constant efforts made by one section or one industry to shift its proper share of taxation upon other shoulders, and Congressional combinations will frequently secure success to such efforts. An army of tax-gatherers will swarm through the country. The faithful and deluded veterans, plundering friend and foe alike. The sums extorted from the people will be prodigious; the revenue received by the Government disproportionate. Honest men will find it hard work to pay their taxes and earn a living. Rogues will laugh at assessors. The resources and vitality of the country are great that it is beyond the power of legislation, however bad, to stop the national progress altogether. But it will unquestionably be retarded, and this will be the case, in spite of all the improvements which can be made in the law.

On the other hand, it must be confessed that the gentleman who would advocate the necessity of taxation by paying off the debt—is one of such difficulty that at first glance every one is disposed to pronounce it insolvable. Still it will do no harm to keep always in view that we ought to solve it if we can, and that as a people we have done many things which had been pronounced impossible. It is well also to remember that the bulk of the debt does not begin to mature till three, five, and eight years hereafter. There is plenty of time for reflection. Attention may be directed to the operation of a sinking fund on a large scale: an institution provided for by law, but thus far not called into existence by the Government. It might be well to inquire whether a system of commutation of taxes could be devised with due regard to the interests of Government and tax-payers; such a system, for instance, as would enable a tax-payer, whose annual income taxes were $100, to get rid of them forever or for life or for two or more lives by paying $10,000 or any other sum. If this could be accomplished a large number of persons would doubtless avail themselves of the opportunity of wealth to purchase immunity from taxation, and the national debt would be reduced in proportion. A thorough study of the principle of averages might enable statisticians to capitalize the annual tax of men starting in life in almost any vocation; and in many cases such a transaction might be able and willing to accept the capitalization, and discharge their share of the debt in full.

All such schemes are mere crudities as yet involving no mean difficulties. But the advantage of getting rid of the internal taxes, if it can by any means be accomplished, is so palpable that the experiment may be offered for proving in every direction in search of a road toward that end.

IGNORANCE AS A POLITICAL DISABILITY.

In the reorganization of the late rebel States, if it is proposed to make ignorance a disqualification for the franchise, let us be careful that the test is not applied two very different things. If reading the Bible or doing a sum in the rule of three are to be the tests of fitness, let every body be brought to the test. But is this the wish or the purpose of the gentlemen who are so anxious that the colored citizen shall be educated before he votes? We have looked with hasty curiosity, but we have not yet discover that it is. We have heard nothing of disfranchising ignorant white men. We are, therefore, constrained to the belief that it is not the ignorance of the blacks it is their complexion which is the real disability. Now ignorance and degradation at the South are not peculiar to the blacks. The whites are hardly less wretched and ignorant. "The blacks are not all quelled to vote," remarks the Tribune. And how many of the whites are quelled by the same standard? The Tribune assumes that the blacks be told "to qualify themselves by intelligence and thrift to vote wisely and safely," and that they shall come to the ballot-box.

What are intelligence and thrift? The fine society, the persons whom the Tribune calls "the gentlemen of the South, the intelligent property holders," were specially ignorant. Did they vote wisely and safely? The Senators, Governors, Representatives, the college-bred planters and their sons, the most highly educated class at the South, did they vote wisely and safely or would they now?

We do not deny, of course, that those who were yesterday the slaves of this fine and polished society, the men who were bought and sold and outraged and imbruted by "the gentlemen of the South, the intelligent property-holders," are to-day generally ignorant and often wretched. But they are as well fitted to be trusted with political power as the ignorant foreigners who constantly swarm into the city, and the still more ignorant and degraded poor whites of the Southern States. As a practical fact of experience these two last classes, with the gentlemen of the South," form a political alliance which is profoundly dangerous to the peace and true welfare of this country. If they are not to be disfranchised by reason of their ignorance, and nobody suggests that they shall be, why should we disfranchise on account of ignorance a body of faithful loyal citizens who would hold that alliance in check?

For what is the condition of the masses of the poor white citizens of the Southern States, who are the natural enemies of the colored man until the latter have qualified themselves "by intelligence and thrift" for a share in political power?

In Mr. GEORGE M. WESTON'S valuable little tract, "The Poor Whites of the South," there is much valuable information upon this point. In Mr. OLMSTED'S books it is also abundant. In a paper upon the present condition of Louisiana in the Christian Examiner for May, 1865, we read that the condition of the poor whites is more deplorable than that of any but the poor whites. The pictures of the war correspondents in the late slave States confirm the universal story. Mr. WILLIAM GREGG, J. R. POSTON, of Charleston, who says in DE BOW'S Review for January, 1850: "The great mass of our poor white population begin to understand that they have rights.....They are fast learning that .....they can elevate themselves and their families from wretchedness and ignorance to competence and intelligence." Mr. WILLIAM GREGG, in an address before the South Carolina Institute in 1851, says: "A large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away an existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest. .....It is painful to be brought in contact with such ignorance and degradation." Governor HAMMOND, of South Carolina, describes the same class in the same way, and they were half of the white population of the State. In a paper, published by Mr. J. H. LUMPKIN, of Georgia, in 1852, he speaks of them as "our poor, degraded, half-clad, half-clothed, and ignorant population." Mr. CHARLES T. JAMES, of Rhode Island, a cotton manufacturer, who had carefully studied the condition of the Southern States as adapted to manufactures, says: "Boys and girls by thousands, destitute both of employment and the means of education, grow up in ignorance and poverty, and, too many of them, to vice and crime." It appears also, in illustration of comparative intelligence, that of native white persons over twenty years of age about one in four hundred is unable to read and write in New England, one in one hundred in New York, and about one in eight in North Carolina.

Certainly if ignorance is to be a political disability, how many Southerners who are not qualified. Yet we wait to hear from the opponents of suffrage for the blacks that these whites shall also be disfranchised. Are we told that the ignorant whites are made safe by the State Constitution? What then? It is for the United States in this emergency to decide whether it will be satisfied with the requirements of these Constitutions. Why are we all debating the subject but because there is a question? If there be a question, what is it but who shall vote in the reorganization of the States?

Is it said that if ignorance in voters be a bad thing, to double the number of ignorant voters will not improve the condition? But why, then, have any ignorant voters? Or if you will have them, why leave half or more of their fellow-citizens helpless in their hands? It is surely better to enfranchise a whole rather than a part of an ignorant population. If there must be an oligarchy, let it, at least, be composed of the intelligent. Moreover, in the case of the Southern States, the surest way to extirpate the ignorance is to enfranchise all the people. The whites have had the political power from the beginning. Who is to blame for the non-initiation the ignorance of the blacks? Continue the sole power in their hands, and what will they do to diminish it? Will they establish Robert Dales, and, if he can not read, he will take care to educate his children. Let Robert Toombs make the law for Robert Shalls, and what chance of education will the children have?

If education, proved by some test of reading and writing, is to be the condition of suffrage in reorganizing the States, let the test be universally applied. Let the Government be just. Let us, above all, be spared the tingling shame of seeing our country, at this period in her history, deliberately denying rights because of color.

A WARNING FROM TENNESSEE.

TENNESSEE is a State which has been reorganized under a constitution which emancipates slaves, and leaves the political rights of the colored citizens to be settled by the Legislature. The consequences already have been foreseen. The House of Representatives of the State has lately passed a series of "black laws," which constantly tend to make colored citizens as "free" persons of color, as if slavery still existed in the State. The whole series shows indeed that the spirit of slavery does exist. No contract between a white and black citizen is to be binding unless witnessed by a white person. In courts the colored citizens may be witnesses against each other. On failure to pay any jail fees after imprisonment colored citizens may be hired out to the highest bidder. The children of colored citizens, whether orphans or not, may be bound out to white persons at the option of the court, and so on.

This is that "unfriendly legislation" which perpetuates indefinitely the trouble and danger of this country. While such laws are passed and valid, Tennessee can not be a truly republican State. And legislation upon democratic principles and a population educated in the midst of a large class disfranchised in obedience to the most hateful prejudice, grows up haughty, unjust, tyrannical, and most dangerous to the common welfare.

Now what the House of Representatives in Tennessee has done, the Senate will do in short. ery has been abolished by the war will do, if permitted, and four millions of faithful, honest people, just as free as Governor BROWNLOW or Mr. ADAMS, and equally entitled with them to a voice in the Government, will be reduced to a condition of serfdom.

But, says some objector, if the people of the States are opposed to enfranchising them, is it good policy to do it? Let us see. Who are the people of the States? Who are "the people" of South Carolina? Are they the numerical minority of the population who are white rebels, or are they the numerical majority who are colored citizens of unswerving loyalty? It is curious to see how the dominance of slavery in this country has destroyed our perceptions of the simplest facts. That the slaves were men even the rebels conceded when they proposed to arm them ; that they were citizens Attorney-General BATES very clearly showed in his official opinion; that they are freemen was established by President LINCOLN'S proclamation, and that they are more than two-fifths of the entire population of the late rebel States, appears from the census of 1860. Yet the New York Times lately used these remarkable words, the italics being its own: "What the President doubtless aims at is to see the people of the South as distinct from the disloyal political managers ..... recognize the new relations in which they stand to the negro population."

The negro population, then, are not even "people!" In such a remark, springing, of course, from no unfair hostility to its colored fellow-citizens, the Times unthinkingly justifies the old lie of slavery that this Government was made by white men, for white men, and, therefore, that white men only are, politically speaking, the people. The truth is that the word "people" was not qualified by color.

In its very remarkable article the Times further says: "When that work [of the people recognizing their new relations to the negroes] is once set about, as it appears to be in Alabama and North Carolina, in a loyal spirit, the question of negro suffrage will find a natural solution in course of time." How it will find it may be inferred from the action of the Tennessee representatives and from the remarks of Mr. HOLDEN, the special representative of the "loyal spirit" in North Carolina, who speaks of the right and duty of "the governing race" to determine whether colored citizens, native of North Carolina, shall live in the State!

Now as we believe that the late slaves in South Carolina, some of whom have subscribed to the national loan, are just as much to be counted among the people as Governor PERRY or Governor MCGRATH, or Mr. AIKEN, or Mayor MACBETH, or CHESTNUT, or ORR, or RHETT, or any other white traitor or loyal citizen, we do not see why they should not be treated as such. And therefore when it is said that the people of South Carolina are opposed to the enfranchisement of their late slaves we can not reply only that we do not believe it. And in any State of which we might suppose such a statement to be true, we should say that experience had proved that the only sure and prejudice of one class of citizens against another to be proto nothy perilous to the public welfare. There is a class in this country, Protestants and Catholics. But what if we should assume the Protestant citizens in any State to be "the people" in distinction to the "Catholic population?" And what if we should suppose that the "Protestant people" should determine upon what conditions the "Catholic population" should vote, and assume they should be allowed to reside in the State?

As Americans and honest men, let us try to remember that governments justly exist by the consent of the governed. When a government goes with taxation—and that Congress is constitutionally bound to secure a republican form of government to every State.

NATIONALITY.

A FRIEND calls attention to a remarkable passage in a volume on "the Apocalypse," by Rev. F. D. MAURICE, of London, who has been a faithful friend of this country during the late struggle. The work was published in 1860, scarcely a year before the attack upon Fort Sumter. The passage is in singular harmony with parts of Mr. BEECHER'S oration at the restoration of the flag upon the fort, and with the masterly pamphlet of Professor TAYLER LEWIS, a Photograph from Ancient History.

> "To talk of nationalities, as politicians talk of them, is easy; to be a nation—to feel that the name is a reality and not a fiction, that is hard; he who would cultivate that feeling must win it through endurance and sacrifice, must learn to measure what is substantial against what is artificial, must discover the importance of many fine philosophical theories. We take this glorious privilege by doubting those which are labelled by the world, we have all our power over those we govern, our honesty toward the Sovereign Will of which we are heralds of which we speak*s scornfully may earn it as our fathers earned it* in blood.

NEWS.

THE war is over, but it seems that we are still to be the prey of foolish, sensational telegrams. Within the last few days we have been informed of the assassination of Mr. SEWARD, of the revolt of the colored troops at Memphis, and of the chaining of JEFFERSON DAVIS in his cell. Each statement has been positively denied on story from Memphis; General CANBY has since telegraphed the surrender of KIRBY SMITH without mentioning his demise; and the story of the chains upon JEFF. comes from Philadelphia.

The remedy for any ill results of such reports must be found in the public common sense. The friends of the rebellion will do all that it is possible to discredit the Government and feed foreign jealousy, as well as to insult and defame colored citizens. But how people ought to make up their story. Our Philadelphia brethren of the press are so good-natured that they can not bear to refuse the hospitality of their columns to every vagabond rumor, and they are probably not surprised that "Philadelphia news" is an article well known in the market.

So with the special dispatches from Washington. The most devoted hunter of news must sometimes return with nothing but the vagnest gossip, and must make his fog pass for food if he can. The intentions of the Government are not probably imparted upon the instant to the industrious gentlemen who collect news, and the distinct assertions that the Government is about to do this or that must be liberally interpreted. We all know in advance that we shall see nothing very injurious to one Secretary in one paper, or to another Secretary in another paper; and it is impossible not to perceive that the special news is very much what the opinions or policy of the special papers that publish it specially require.

Bearing such facts in mind, a man can read his daily newspaper with much more peace of mind than if he abandoned himself to implicit belief of every thing he finds in it. The news is undoubtedly true that there is undoubtedly a great deal there which is not news, and never will be.

"DEATH AND VICTORY."

THE first day of June was observed as a day of humiliation and prayer, in memory of the murdered President. In the midst of triumph Death reigns. In the hour of jubilee our hearts bow before the mysterious fact that the death of the good and the old, the good and the true, has secured the victory. This is evidently the thought which Mr. NAST has expressed in the large picture of this Number of the Weekly.

Through all its awful upon his throne, while Victory kneels before him, the sword falling from his hands and the laurel laid away from his brow. The consciousness of his power in his late triumphs is the family which reads the appalling news of the 15th of April, and to the emancipated slaves who know that the Terrors has struck their earthly saviour. In a city street, below, the news of the great victory exults every heart; but immediately in the corresponding sketch, Death touches those hearts with startling sorrow. Death also binds in sympathy America and other lands.

Mr. NAST has given to the initial Society six weeks ago. So over our sunny festival the cold shadow fell. But to-day, that the moment of sorrow is passing, that the bereavement has only strengthened and sobered us, let Victory raise his head, resume his laurels, and say, in perfect faith: "Death, where is thy sting? Grave, where is thy victory?"

LITERARY.

THE Hon. ISAAC N. ARNOLD, of Chicago, Member of Congress during the last years of Mr. LINCOLN'S administration, and his personal friend, is preparing memoirs of his life and administration of President LINCOLN, with a history of the important legislation of the same period. At the time of Mr. LINCOLN'S death in 1860 a friend asked Mr. ARNOLD what kind of man the candidate was. Mr. ARNOLD replied, "He has all the tenacity without the humor of JACKSON." His administration fully justified this shrewd opinion.

"Historical View of the American Revolution," by GEORGE WASHINGTON GREENE (TICKNOR, FIELDS, & CO.). Mr. GREENE has given us not only a generally valuable, but a peculiarly timely volume. The grandson of WASHINGTON'S friend, General GREENE, he has long made the Revolution his special study. He has united, nervous style presents its results in the most attractive manner. His book will amply reward the attention which the intrinsic interest of the subject is sure to awaken.

TO TRIUMPHE!

BY LIEUTENANT RICHARD REALF.

Nor ever, in all human time,
Did any man or nation
Plant foot upon the peaks sublime
Of Mount Transfiguration;
But first in battle-throng hours
Of dread and solemn being
Clashed battle 'gainst Satanic powers,
Alone with the All-seeing.

God's glory lights no mortal brows
Which have not first been wet
No wine hath He for lips of those
His lees who never tasted.
Nor ever, till in bloodlest stress
The heart is wrung and tortured,
Does the All-brooding Tenderness
Cry, "This is my beloved!"

O land, through years of shrouded nights
In triple blackness groping,
Toward the far dayspring of the lights
That beacon the world's hoping—
Behold! no title shalt thou miss
Of that transcendent glory
To all who, dragged through hell's abyss,
Hold fast their grip on heaven.

The Lord God's purpose throbs along
Our stormy turbulences;
He keeps the sap of nations strong
By blood-red recompenses.
The Lord God sows his righteous grain
In battle-blasted furrows,
And draws from our darkest days of pain
Large peace for calm to-morrows.

From strokes of unseen cimeters
A million hearts are bleeding;
A cry runs tingling to the stars
Of babes' and widows' pleading:
While at hell's altars sacrificed—
God's martyred son forever—
Lies the clear life that crystallized
Our kindliest endeavor.

And yet beneath our brimming tears
Lies nobler cause for singing
Than ever in the shining years
When all our vales were ringing
With happy sounds of mellow peace;
And all our cities thundered
With lusty echoes, and our seas
By freighted keels were sundered.

For lo! the branding flails that drave
Our husks of foul self from us
Show all the watching heroes we have Immortal grain of promise.
And lo! the dreadful blasts that blew
In gusts of fire and ice
Have scorched and winnowed from the true
The falseness which undid us.

No floundering more, for mind or heart,
Among the lower levels;
No welcome more for moods that sort
With satyrs and with devils;
But over all our fruitful slopes,
On all our plains of beauty,
Fair temples for fair human hopes,
And altar-thrones for duty.

Wherefore, O ransomed people, shout!
O banners, wave in glory!
O bugles, blow the triumph out!
O drums, strike up the story!
Clang, broken fetters, idle swords!
Clap hands, O States, together!
And let all praises be Lord's
Our Saviour and our Father.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S AMNESTY PROCLAMATION.

On the 29th of May President Johnson issued a proclamation granting amnesty to all persons who have directly or indirectly taken part in the rebellion, with the restorations of all rights of property except as to slaves, and excepting in cases where legal proceedings have been instituted for the confiscation of property, on condition of their taking an oath to defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States, and to obey all laws and proclamations which have been made during the rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. Those are excluded from pardon, except on special application to the President, who are the classes of persons: Those who have, in order to aid the rebellion, left judicial positions or seats in Congress, or who have resigned commissions in the army or navy, or absented themselves from the country; those who were educated at West Point or the United States Naval Academy; those who have engaged in the destruction of our commerce, or who have been engaged in treating the United States' prisoners of war as felons in military, naval, or civil confinement as prisoners of war; all persons who have voluntarily participated in the rebellion, and the estimated value of whose taxable property is over twenty thousand dollars; all who have taken and violated the previous amnesty oath; and all who have held military service above the rank of colonel in the army or lieutenant in the navy.

RECONSTRUCTION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

On the 29th of May President Johnson issued a proclamation in relation to the State of North Carolina of the following import: That the object is to give the people of the Constitution to guarantee to every State a republican form of government, and whereas the rebellion has deprived the people of the State of North Carolina of all civil government, and it becomes necessary and proper that obligations of the United States to the people of North Carolina to the time therefore appoint William W. Holden Provisional Governor of the State, with orders to prescribe such executive powers for executing the constitution as delegates to which shall be chosen by loyal citizens, for the purpose of altering or amending the Constitution of the State, and with authority to restore the State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of government as shall entitle the State to the guarantees of the United States therefor. No person, according to the terms of the proclamation, can be elected or vote in the election prescribed before taking the amnesty oath, nor any one who is not a voter qualified by the State Constitution of 1861. The convention shall have assembled it shall have the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters and of the eligibility of persons to hold office under the laws of the State.

THE CONSUMMATION OF PEACE.

The following dispatch from Secretary STANTON announces the surrender of Kirby Smith's army:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, May 27, 1865.

Major-General Dix:

A dispatch from General Canby, dated at New Orleans yesterday, the 26th instant, states that arrangements for the surrender of the Confederate forces in the Trans-Mississippi Department have been agreed upon. This includes the men and material of the army and navy.

EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Following upon this memorable event the President has released all the restrictions embarrassed by military tribunals to confidence during the war.

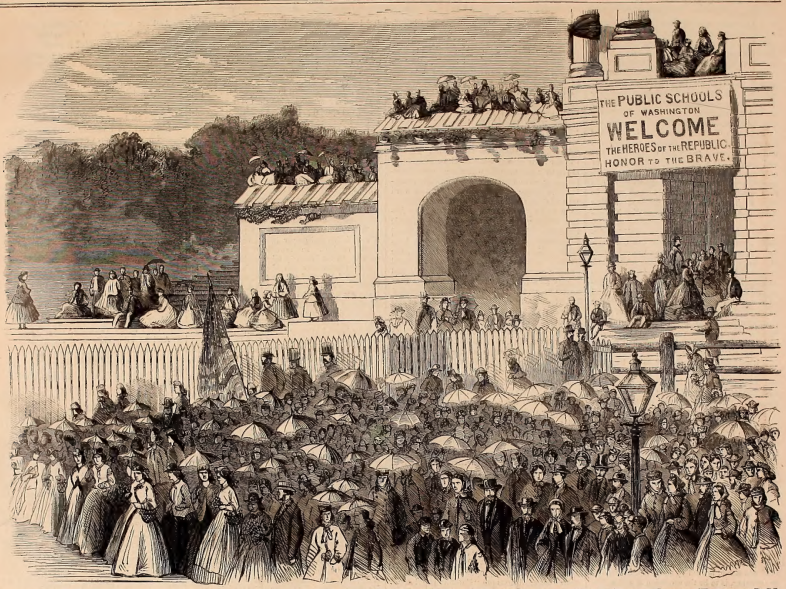
THE END OF THE "STONEWALL."

On the supposing of the 19th an impromptu council was held at Havana, at which the Captain-General of Cuba presided, the Consul-General Captain Blake, of the Spaniard, engaged to deliver up his ship to the authorities of the island, to be held in trust for the United States Government. He wished at first to give up the vessel on the condition that the vessel should not be surrendered to the United States. General Dulce refused to bind himself by any such condition. The United States flag was hoisted at noon on the 19th. There were several Federal vessels of war in port at the time, among which were the Niagara, Captain Worden, the Aries, Connecticut, and others.

INDICTMENT OF DAVIS.

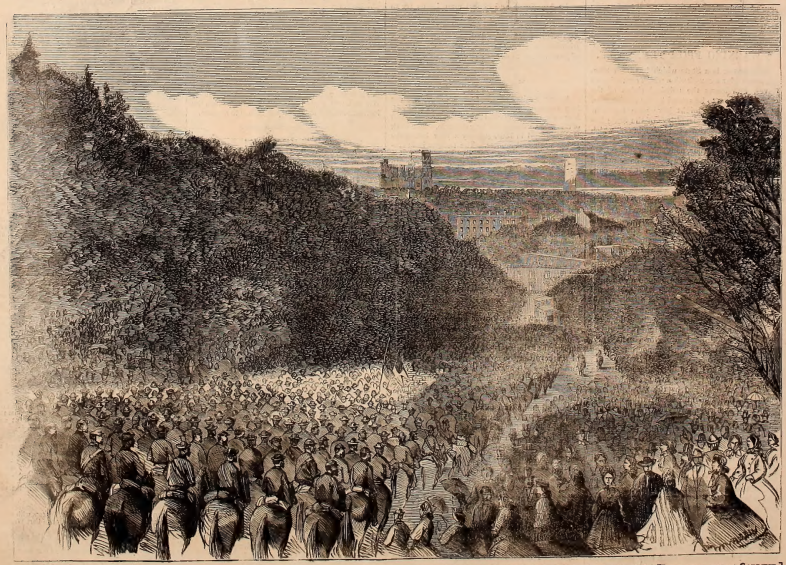
On the 26th of May the Grand Jury of the District of Columbia reported to the Supreme Court of the District an indictment against JEFFERSON DAVIS for assault and battery, Fort Stevens, said assault being an overt act of war against the United States Government. A similar indictment was brought against John C. Breckinridge.

THE EXPLOSION AT MOBILE.



On the 24th of May the main Ordnance Department at Mobile blew up with a terrible explosion. About three hundred persons were instantly killed and many more wounded, while large numbers were buried in the ruins. Eight entire squares of the city were demolished, and about eight thousand bales of cotton destroyed. The whole city was shaken as if by an earthquake by the explosion, the cause of which was not ascertained.

THE NEWS ITEMS.



Alexander H. Stephens and John H. Reagan, with other notable rebel prisoners, were transferred to Fort Warren, in Boston harbor, on the 26th of May.

The story of a plot at Memphis among the negro soldiers to massacre the white rebel prisoners is now said to be a hoax. General Washburne says it is false in every particular.

General Beauregard, of whom we have heard very little for the past two months, was in New Orleans on the 19th and registered his name at General Banks's head-quarters as a paroled rebel officer.

WILD FLOWERS AT SUNSET.

As the bright red sun went down last night,
With my flowers a vigil I kept,
Their starry blossoms of blue and white
Were lovingly turn'd to the western light,
Till gently they droop'd and slept.

The daisy was first to bid adieu
To the light of the glorious sun;
He had watched his journey the whole day through,
His golden eye had been fondly true
To his mate, till the day was done

The shamrock, sacred in days of yore,
Was folding his triple leaf,
The lad o' wishes lingered before,
And the violet bent to the mossy floor,
Like a bird on the nest to brood.

At rest were the wild flower and the fay,
And at rest was the cowslip bell;
And darker and darker grew the sky,
Till stately and I was the glowing eye
Of the light-loving pimpernel.

The strawberry blossom bow'd his head,
And nestled his leaves between,
Or crept away to a mossy bed;
And the sweet thyme's cup of its dew so red,
And folded its trefoil green.

The primroses paler and paler grew,
The celandine shone no more;
A parting grace to the pansy-eye-ed threw,
As it closed the pensive eye of blue
That looked to the skies before.

At last the world seem'd all at rest,
The glorious sun was shaded;
Though a lovely mountain bound the west,
No fire glow'd from his lofty crest,
To mark where his light had faded.

And darkness reigned, till nowhereas fair
Fell on the earth my wild flowers;
And brighter'd the dews that were gathering there,
On the bank and the meadow, and every where,
Like the drop of a summer shower.

The large green leaves of the cowslip bright,
And the wings of the primrose fair,
That had faded and droop'd in the heat and light,
Now rose refresh'd in the shadow of night,
And enjoy'd the cool, sweet air.

And many a lesson I learn'd at the sight
Of the beauty and trusting love;
Of those humble flowers through the shadowy night,
And those flowers that bloom'd in the broad daylight,
And the sun and moon above.

THE GRAND REVIEW AT WASHINGTON.

In the spring of 1861 there was raised a cry of alarm—"The Capital is in danger!" and thousands of young and brave men, from the north, south, east and from the states that paltered on the near military displays during the war. Little attention could be given to their respective principles on the north or the battle-field—the only idea of the march was to find the enemy; the only idea of the battle to get the advantage of him, and capture or drive him from the field.

It was fitting therefore that when the work had all been done, our soldiers who have borne the burden, should, as they returned bringing Peace back with them as a gift to the people, receive in turn some token of the popular appreciation of their services.

It was no ordinary pageant that turned all the people's eyes and so many hearts to Washington on the 23d and 24th of May. It was not the fact that it all probability the people would never recur of seeing two hundred thousand soldiers passing in review. It was no mere idle curiosity, but a deep, glorious, solemn sentiment. This sentiment was one of pride mingled with infinite pathos—pride in the youthful strength of a republic tried and steadfast—pathos from the remembrance of countless heroes who have received their crowns and whose mortal hands are upon mortal brows, who died many of them while the war seemed yet uncertain.

Only the soldier can appreciate the full meaning of this grand march through Washington. He has been the actor all along while we have been but spectators, even at here. Some of these soldiers have marched from Washington, and have returned by a circuitous route through the bloody campaigns of Chattanooga, Atlanta, and the weary marches through Georgia and North Carolina. Such was the case with the Twentieth Corps—HOOKER'S old command.

THE SCENE AT THE CAPITOL.

According to Lieutenant-General GRANT's order of march, the troops of the Potomac, under General MEADE, would be reviewed on the 23d, and the armies of Tennessee and Georgia, under General SHERMAN, on the 24th. Each day the head of the column rested at the foot of Capitol Hill, beginning its march from that point at 9 o'clock A.M., passing around the Capitol to a camp-fire Avenue, and up the Avenue to the Aqueduct Bridge, and thence back to camp.

On the north end of the Capitol the scholars of the intermediate and grammar schools took their places, the boys on the hill and the girls on the Capitol steps. The girls were dressed in white; the boys wore white pants and blue jackets. As the veterans passed by, these children greeted the column with songs, and, as they were a numerous choir, the effect was very beautiful. The children also displayed a large number of banners. On the northwest corner of the Capitol was the following very appropriate motto: "The only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to the victorious Union soldiers." The scene at this point we have illustrated on page 356.

On the same page a view is presented of SHERMAN's cavalry passing down Capitol Hill toward Pennsylvania Avenue. These heroes of Winchester, Cedar Creek, Five Forks were a host in themselves three quarters in passing the Capitol. SHERIDAN, the life of this glorious company, was not present, having been assigned to a distant department of operations. But General MERRITT and CUSTER in great measure commanded in his absence. They were enthusiastically cheered as they passed. On the next page a fuller view is given of the cavalry as it passed down Pennsylvania Avenue.

BEFORE THE WHITE HOUSE.

The stand from which the armies were reviewed was situated in front of the White House. Here, at an early hour, the President and Lieutenant-General, accompanied by General MEADE, took their places, being afterward joined by General PARKE, in command of the Ninth Corps. General MEADE, as he approached the stand, was accompanied by his staff, bearing the head-quarters flag of the Army of the Potomac. This flag was of a very beautiful design. The back-ground was Sublerine, and a golden eagle stood out from this, surmounted by a white star.

The principal stand, of which we give an illustration on our first page, was about 120 feet long, and was handsomely decorated. In its base and wings were composed of American flags, and its columns were wreathed with hospital flags of yellow and green. Above these waved white flags—the tokens of a conquered peace. Upon the Jraping of the flags were inscribed the names of fifteen gigantic battles. They were as follows: Over the names of Atlanta, Wilderness, Stone River, South Mountain, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Savannah, Richmond, Petersburg, Gettysburg, Lookout Mountain, Nashville, Chattanooga, Antietam, and Spottsylvania. President JOHNSON occupied a central position on the stand. At his right and left were seated for the several corps commanders, who occupied it in succession as their commands came in view. In the front rank of seats next to this corps commanders' seat, on the left, were seated Secretary of War STANTON, Lieutenant-General GRANT, and their Major-General RAWLINS, General GRANT's Chief of Staff. On the left of the President were Postmaster-General DENISON, Secretary of the Interior HARLAN, Secretary of the Navy WELLES, Quarter-master-General MEIGS, and Major-General BARNARD. On the opposite side of the President, commencing on the right, were Colonel PARKER, the Indian officer on the staff of General GRANT; Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury; General MEADE, Mrs. and Miss DENNISON, Major-General BARRY, Mrs. WELLES, Major-General SANDFORD, New York Secretary of State, and Secretary R. FOSTER, of Maryland. Upon the third row of seats were Assistant Secretary of the Navy FOX, and Admiral SMITHSON, and other distinguished naval officers. In the front row, upon the wings, were seated Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury HARRIS and CONOVER, Assistant Secretary of War DANA, Secretary of the Navy WELLES, Quarter-master-General MEIGS, and Major-General BARNARD. On the opposite side of these rows were seated, on the right, were Colonel PARKER, the Indian officer on the staff of General GRANT; Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury; General MEADE, Mrs. and Miss DENNISON, Major-General BARRY, Mrs. WELLES, Major-General SANDFORD, New York Secretary of State, and Secretary R. FOSTER, of Maryland. Upon the third row of seats were Assistant Secretary of the Navy FOX, and Admiral SMITHSON, and other distinguished naval officers. In the front row, upon the wings, were seated Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury HARRIS and CONOVER, Assistant Secretary of War DANA, Secretary of the Navy WELLES, Quarter-master-General MEIGS, and Major-General BARNARD. On the opposite side of the President were Postmaster-General RANDALL, and Mr. MCCLELLAN, and Major WALLACE. The rest of this stand, which was capable of accommodating a hundred persons, was filled by the wives of diplomatic corps and the families of those entitled to seats upon the stand.

Before this stand the whole army passed in review. The day was auspicious, and nothing marred the splendor of the spectacle. First came the cavalry, then the infantry, under General MEADE. This latter was BURNSIDE's famous corps, and their battered banners told of a score of hard-fought battles. The gallant FITZ JOHN PORTER looked as fresh as on the day before, their songs were just as merry and inspiring, and their floral gifts as generously bestowed. Following the Ninth Corps, the Cavalry Brigade was greeted with especial enthusiasm along the whole line. They and their horses, says the Herald's correspondent, looked magnificently, and flowers until they were obliged to refuse any more. The transportation brigade of the "Bummers Corps" caused much amusement as it passed.

First in order came the Fifteenth Corps, SHERMAN's old command, now under General HAZEN, the hero of Fort McAllister. Among the officers commanders was General CORSE, the brave defender of Allatoona.

BLAIR's Corps—the Seventeenth—followed. As it passed Willard's Hotel a deputation from the citizens of Missouri presented General BLAIR with a splendid corps flag, while some ladies presented flowers.

The Army of Georgia consisted of the Fourteenth and Twentieth corps. The latter of these had the advance. The Fourteenth was General THOMAS' old command. With this corps he had stood between ROSECRANS and the entire rebel army at Chickamauga, when all the other commands had been broken. This corps was organized immediately after the battle of Stone River. When THOMAS took command of the Army of the Cumberland he was succeeded in command of the corps by General JOHN M. PALMER. The latter was succeeded by General JEFFERSON C. DAVIS at Atlanta.

The Twentieth Corps was General HOOKER's old command. Its history is fresh in the popular memory. No words of ours can add any thing to the glory attained by this corps beneath or above the clouds. Its division commanders, Generals MOWER, WILLIAMS, and GRAVES, deserve to be mentioned as soldiers who have done hard service which only history will appreciate and reward.

THE REVIEW.

On page 365 we give an illustration representing SHERMAN's veteran armies crossing Long Bridge in the early part of the day. It is impossible here not to recur to a far different scene which occurred in 1861, when our soldiers crossed this bridge to the defence of Washington. It was the invasion of the "sacred soil," which has since been trampled by half a score of armies.

Thus passed the review of the national armies. Many commands equally worthy of notice were not permitted to take part in the spectacle, because of their distance from the point of concentrative duty in the field or in garrison. The occasion will be long remembered. May the time never come when the people of the north shall again be called to enter the field against any foe whether domestic or foreign! The God of Battles has granted the nation victory. Let us pray that He may find for many generations grant that we may live in peace and quietness!

TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

WE continue from our last number the record of the trial going on at Washington against the conspirators. During the review of the troops there was an intermission on Thursday, May 18, the Court was again opened. On that day the remaining evidence for the prosecution was taken.

The testimony of Mary Marsh, Captain Emery, Benjamin Dewey, William Bull, and E. W. Rose related to matters before given by other witnesses. The import of this testimony we shall give in a future number.

George H. Gordon testified that he served in the rebel service; that in 1864 he had seen him in the rebel uniform.

John L. Caldwell was then sworn. He was at Mrs. Slowe's grocery-store on Seventh street the morning after the assassination. At about eight o'clock ARNOLD came into the store and asked for a drink to Colonel Ely. The latter at length loaned him the amount, taking ARNOLD's revolver as security.

A number of Mr. Mudd's slaves were then sworn. These were Alfred Mudd, who resided in his house, and was one of his slaves to build batteries at Richmond. One of these slaves testified to the fact of a conference between Mudd and John Surratt. He had heard Dr. Mudd second the proposition that Booth should begin to work and get killed long ago.

Another colored man, William Marshall, testified that he had heard a conversation between a Mr. Gardiner and Dr. Mudd about the assassination. The Reprehensible Murderer said: "Sam, we guess them hell down the Rappahannock." Dr. Mudd said, "I guess they will."

The testimony for the prosecution having been given, the case for the defence began. The first witness offered was in behalf of Mrs. Surratt.

Father WALTER, of Baltimore, Somerset were the witnesses first called. These testified that they knew nothing particular of the life of Mrs. Surratt.

The testimony of Mrs. Elias Holloman, the next witness, was then given. She had seen Booth on the morning after April 16, tended rather to establish than to weaken the evidence for the prosecution in regard to the effect that the assassination would have. She went to church with Mrs. Surratt very often during Lent.

Miss Honora Fitzpatrick, a boarder at Mrs. Surratt's since last October, was the next witness. Her testimony was forcibly corroborative of that given by Weichman. She saw Booth at Mrs. Surratt's on the Monday before the assassination.

R. F. Gwyn, being sworn, stated that on the 14th of December he saw Weichman, and met Mrs. Surratt at Surrattsville, when she gave him a letter for Mr. Nothy. He met Mrs. Surratt at Surrattsville, at 4 P. M., as she was partially intoxicated.

Captain Gwynn, of Washington, into whose care Lloyd was given after his arrest, was the next witness. He testified that Lloyd at the time of his arrest stated that he was intending to do with the crime. At length, upon being told that the murder of Mr. Lincoln was a fact, he said, "Oh, my God! if I should make a confession they would murder me!" He made a confession to vice versâ Captain him, he said, "These parties in the conspiracy. Upon being put in the witness-box Lloyd was overcome. In his statement he already been recorded as a part of his confession. He was then excused.

Through Mr. R. J. Cosby and Mr. O'Laughlin an attempt was made to establish an alibi in the case of prisoner O'Laughlin. The former had come on April 15th, with O'Laughlin and Spangler, to witness to Weichman. The train reached Washington at about 8 P.M. The party were with each other all that night. Cosby left them immediately out, and O'Laughlin went with Cosby to the National Hotel, a few minutes after the news of the assassination, and then back to Mecker's dining-saloon, where Cosby's party had gone to get something to eat. They left there about half past even or eight o'clock, and went to Third Street, where Cosby and Joseph Wheeler parted with Cosby and Henderson, saying they were going to catch a mid-night train for Alexandria. They were then accompanied by Daniel Lockran, and the whole party started up the avenue to see the illumination. After a while Cosby and O'Laughlin, with Lockran, went into the Canterbury Hotel, and remained there until about 2 o'clock. Then they went to the Metropolitan Hotel, and had a drink together. Cosby and they resided in that quarter or half past ten o'clock. They remained one hour. O'Laughlin was with Cosby all that night. Cosby met with O'Laughlin nearly all day on Friday. On Friday evening he was at the house of Mrs. Atlock, when O'Laughlin went out from Rollman's with Mr. Surratt.

The following letter was also produced, written to Mrs. Surratt by George N. Calvert:

Other testimony was also adduced proving an unquestionable alibi.

On Friday R. F. Gwyn was recalled, and the letter given by him to Mrs. Surratt to Mr. Nothy was produced. The following is a copy:

"Mr. John Nothy:

"SIR,—I have this day received a letter from Mr. Calvert, intimating that either you or your friend have represented that I am in arrears to you for rent. I am at a loss to understand. You know that I am ready, and have been waiting for you for three weeks to settle with me. If you can come within the next ten days, I will settle with Mr. Calvert, and bring with against you immediately. Mr. Calvert will give you a deed on receiving payment.

"Yours respectfully, MRS. E. SURRATT.

"Administratrix of J. M. Surratt."

Two more Catholic priests testified that Mrs. Surratt was a good Catholic.

The following letter was also produced, written to Mrs. Surratt by George N. Calvert:

"SURRATTSVILLE, April 13, 1865.

"MRS. M. E. Surratt:

"DEAR MADAM,—During a late visit to the lower portion of the county I ascertained of the willingness of Mr. Nothy to settle with you, and desire to call your attention to the fact. In saying the entanglement, I must insist upon closing up this matter, as imperative in an early settlement of the estate, which is necessary. You will therefore please to call on your earliest convenience to know how and when you will be able to pay the balance remaining due on the land purchased by you from him.

"Yours respectfully, GEORGE N. CALVERT, JR."

R. H. Nothey, brother-in-law of O'Laughlin, testified that O'Laughlin came to Baltimore from the South in August, 1863. He was unemployed. After about a month he went with his brother to Washington in the produce and feed business. Here he remained until the fall of 1863, when his brother removed from Washington, leaving him the entire charge of the Washington business. Maulsby then stated the circumstances attending the arrest of O'Laughlin.

Here some important evidence was adduced for the prosecution.

Lewis W. Chamberlain, who had been on duty in the War Office, was sworn in Richmond Hentfield in the handwriting of Judge John A. Campbell and Harrison in the latter's handwriting, Assistant Adjutant Secretary.

Henry Finzgas was then sworn. In February he was in Montreal, Canada. On the 15th of that month he had a conversation between George N. Sanders and William Cleary. Cleary said, "I suppose they are getting ready for the inauguration of Lincoln next month?" Sanders said, "Yes; but if the boys only have the courage Lincoln will not trouble them much longer." Cleary asked if all was right. Sanders replied, "Oh yes; Booth is attending to the job."

Charles Sweeney and James Young testified further as to the cruelties inflicted on Union prisoners.

The evidence for the defence was then again resumed.

John Nothy testified to having purchased from Mrs. Surratt property in Prince George county, and that he had received from her the letter already produced as testimony.

Dr. John C. Thomas was then called upon for the privilege of invalidating the testimony which had been given against Dr. Mudd. He said it was not until after the assassination that his brother told him about the remark made by Dr. Mudd some weeks before. He said his brother's wife had told him about it. Upon being cross-examined he admitted that his brother seemed to be in his right mind when he was conversing on the subject with him.

Bernard T. Mudd testified to Dr. Mudd's good character. He had heard him express an disloyal sentiment.

John C. Thomas then testified to Booth's having called Dr. Gwyn, his father-in-law, in October or November last, to attend Dr. Gwyn's family. He was then at church at Bryantown. Here Booth was introduced to Dr. Mudd. Booth's statement was given in violation of secrecy to purchase lands.

On Saturday, the 27th, further important testimony was offered for the prosecution.

George P. Fisher, who in the trial of the St. Albans raiders took charge of the case for the United States Government, was then sworn. He was in Montreal at the trial Thompson, Sanders, Clay, and others defended the raiders. Sanders declared to do this at the offices of Confederate States. Cleary had testified that the raiders were in the Confederate service. The following letter was given in evidence:

"CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

"WAR DEPARTMENT, RICHMOND, VA., June 16, 1864.

"To Lieutenant——, Commanding——:

"LIEUTENANT,—You have been appointed temporarily in the service of the provisional army for special service. You will proceed without delay to the British provinces, where you will report to Lieutenant-General Dick Taylor for instructions. You will, under their directions, take such steps as you may deem best to have organized as many men not exceeding twenty in number, as you may deem suitable for the service, and as can be relied upon secretly to be may be intrusted to you. You will take care to consult as much secrecy as the case will admit, and be very limited in instructions. You and your men will receive from them positions because you will be under the command of whom the commutation therefor.

"By order of JOHN A. SEDDON, Secretary of War."

William R. Nevins was then called to the stand. Nevins, is a resident of New York, was in Washington on the 11th of April, and was present at the Kirkwood House. He identified Atzerott as a man whom he met at that house, on the morning of the 14th, and saw him in Booth's company room. Nevins did not know the number, but pointed out the room, remarking that Mr. Atzerott was then with Booth. Atzerott then looked in the dining-room, when Nevins left sight of him.

Bettie Washington, a colored woman, was then called for the defence. She had lived in Dr. Mudd's family on Monday after Christmas. She had not been absent for a single night from Dr. Mudd's house since that time. Dr. Mudd had been absent from home on three occasions, separated by one or two days each interval. He had been called late in the evening at Mr. George Gardiner's party: second, he had been to Bryantown; third, to Leonardtown. He had been to Washington, returning the next day.

Upon Dr. Mudd's being recalled, he stated that he did not think he could believe Daniel G. Thomas, witness for the prosecution. He had never had any difficulty with him nor seen who had ever said any thing against Thomas. He had never told Mrs. Mudd, as she had stated, or proposed his opinion on the occasion of Thomas having accused a Mr. Hall of being a rebel soldier.

The testimony of R. F. Gwyn (recalled) and Jerry Dyer, was then given, the substance of which was given for the defence, proving that although the persons harbored and aid by Dr. Mudd were not known to be engaged in hostility to military organizations known to be opposed to the Government of the United States. It was satisfied by some of that Dr. Mudd himself belonged to an organization of this character.

Frank Washington, a colored man living last year with Dr. Mudd, was then produced to testify to the veracity of Mary Simms, a colored witness for the prosecution. The witness testified that Mary Simms was not to be believed on oath. Other witnesses were then called to prove the same fact. Dr. Mudd's character was then established for defence, proving that although the persons harbored and aided eral Lee; I considered, and after a time told him I would go; he then told me he wanted me to take a certain quantity of clothing—he did not say how much—coats, pants, and underclothing, into the States, and dispose of them at auction; he wished me to take them into Washington City, into Norfolk, and as far south as I could go, where the General Government had possession; he wanted me to sell them on a hot day or night; it did not matter what money he got for the clothes; I was just to dispose of them for what I could get; I was to Toronto to go on with my negotiations for the sale of it [left] to me at the St. Stuart Robinson where I was, and he was to telegraph or write to my residence whether I should go or remain. I went on with my York until, I think, the 8th of June, 1864; on Sunday, the 5th, I had been down to the Falls to boats home to a customer of mine; when I returned my wife had a letter in her hand from Dr. Blackburn; he had just left there: I called on Dr. Robinson, and asked him what I could do; he said he did not know; I did not know what to; he did not wish himself to commit overt act against the United States Government; I could not; I could take only just enough money to carry me down to Montreal: I had not. Mr. Slaughter knew, he gave me directions to proceed to Halifax, where I was to meet Dr. Blackburn; the letter was dated May 30, 1864, from Bermuda; I went down to Halifax: Dr. Blackburn arrived there about the 11th of July, from Havana; he went down to the hotel where I was stopping; I went to see him; he told me he had ordered there which had been shipped off, and, in accordance with his direction, took an express wagon belonging to the hotel down to the steamboat landing, and got there eight trunks and a valise; he directed me to take the things to my hotel and put them in a private room, which I did, and notified Dr. Blackburn; he asked me if I would take the valise into the States, and send it by express, accompanied with a letter, as a package to Governor Lincoln; I objected, and the valise was taken to his hotel; he ordered me to accompany the marshal of the trunks; they had Spanish names on them, so that no man would go with me next morning to make arrangements with one or two vessels going to Boston to smuggle the trunks through; I went down, as directed, and made application to Captain McGregor; I did not remember the name of the vessel; the one who went with me had a conversation with Captain McGregor; I don't know what he said, but Captain McGregor refused to take the trunks; I went back to the bank; Captain Cogan, John O'Brien; the officer who was with me said I had some goods I wanted to take to my friends in Connecticut and Boston, etc.,—and that he wanted to make an arrangement to smuggle them into Boston; I told Cogan and he had a private consultation; when they came out Cogan ordered them on board the St. Stuart; and Cogan smuggle them in; we took them on board his vessel that day; on arriving at Boston it was for five days before we got an opportunity of getting them off, but he succeeded at last in doing it, and expressed them through to Philadelphia; from there I brought them to Baltimore, and brought the trunks down to Washington; the last of them I gave to a man representing himself as a suttler from Boston, by the name of Perry; I understood at the time that he was a suttler in Sigel's army; he said he had found goods which he was going to take to Newport, News Centre; my instructions were to make a market for the goods, and I turned them over to Mr. Blackburn; I told me at the time that he could have about one million dollars of money, and never had occasion to be disposed of."

Upon being asked what was the object of the scheme, Hyams answered, "To destroy the army and every body in the country that was being been asked to where we current on his return to Canada, Hyams replied:

"I was introduced to Hamilton without stopping there I had to wait for the cars, and was met by Mr. Mcdonald and C. C. Clay; they both shook hands with me, greeted me heartily, and congratulated me on my safe return, and on my success; they told me I had performed a great mission for the future; I telegraphed to Dr. Blackburn, who was then stopping at Montreal, as Dr. Blackburn had told me, that I had returned. Next night, between eleven and twelve o'clock, Dr. Blackburn came to my room, and I met him there; I was in bed, but looked out of the window and saw Dr. Blackburn; he told me to come down and open the door; that I was like all other rascals after doing something, and the devil was after me; I got up accordingly, and let James H. Young; he asked me how I disposed of the goods which I had sent to him; he said he thought I had been disposed of, that that would kill at 'Big Bethel;' he said he was in a quandary about the matter; I was in my business there since I had been away, and that I needed money; he said he would see what he could do, and make arrangements to draw upon him for any money I desired; he said the Government at Richmond was not in the attention to the yellow-fever raging at Bermuda. He would see me; I went to see Jacob Thompson the next day, and made arrangements with Thompson to draw and made arrangements to pay me $100 had been disposed of according to my instructions, when the goods were sold; he said, 'I will give you $50 now, and the balance is against Dr. Blackburn; when you see me you have only to say, 'I have been a messenger for $50 on account of Dr. Blackburn;' I will pay you the balance.' Jacob Thompson seemed to have a perfect knowledge of the character of Dr. Blackburn; I left Hyams, but saw him several times after that between Dr. Blackburn, and Thompson said that there was $700,000 present had appropriated for that purpose $700,000."

Hyams further stated that Colonel Tucker, Jacob Thompson and Mr. Alexander were connected with his business.

A. Bremier, in the service of Mr. Wallace, testified that he then in Washington, to whom the infected clothing had been assigned for sale by suction, testified that he had received the package, having advanced one hundred dollars on them.

Secretary of Legation of Jacob Thompson seemed to have a perfect knowledge of the character of Dr. Blackburn. The witness stated that the first large sum promised by Hyams, but which was not received, was from Thompson and Dr. Blackburn, and Thompson said that purpose $700,000."

Hyams further stated that Colonel Tucker, C. C. Clay

THE VACANT PLACE.

THERE'S a vacant place in the circle,
And an empty chair by the hearth
When the evening shadows gather
And the evening lamps are lit;
There's a vacant place in the circle
Which no longer rings with mirth,
And an empty chair by the fireside,
Where of old he used to sit.

Ah! and was the day when he left us,
But sadder now to us all
Are those golden days of promise
As we gaze on his vacant place;
And sadder still when at twilight
The shadows begin to fall,
As we look at the one chair empty
And think of his kindly face.

He bade us remember his coming
When the good time should come round,
And never his voice once faltered,
For his heart was brave and true;
Than we heard the shrill fifes screaming,
And the loud drums' rattling sound,
And watched him pass with the column
In his suit of army blue.

Then quick came the news of a battle,
And our hearts with fear were stirred,
And the hope which had warmed my bosom
Grew ill of a sudden chilled,
When at last one morn from a paper,
Where the words seemed strangely blurred,
I read the story of her
In a long, long list of killed.

He sleeps in the grave where they placed him
On the distant field of strife,
Where the ground is ridged with hillocks
Like the waves of a troubled sea;
And we at home, in our sorrow,
Still mourn for a vanished life,
While the jubilant air is ringing
With the burden of victory.

Ah! and was the day when he left us,
But sadder now to all
Shine these golden days of promise
As we gaze on his vacant place;
But sadder of all the twilight
When the shadows begin to fall,
And we look on the one chair empty
And think of his kindly face.

CHAPTER XI.

UP AT THE CHURCH.

THREE hours later Saxon was sitting alone before the organ in the little chapel on the hill. One hand supported his head, the other rested listlessly upon the keys. A tattered mass of Palestrina's lay open upon the music-desk; but Saxon's eyes were turned toward the door, and his thoughts were far away. He had been playing half an hour or an hour ago, and had fallen since then into a long and anxious train of thought. He had even forgotten the little fatherly hand which he acted for him as blower, and who had lifted his feet asleep in the sunshine that streamed through the south window at the back of the organ.

It was a plain, white-washed, brown-rafftered little church, with a row of deal benches on each side of the aisle, and a pulpit to match. On a long board close to the door to the roof just above the altar was painted, in gaudy characters of gold and scarlet, a German couplet signifying, "Where God is, there is liberty." The organ was of old dark oak, with ebony keys; and on the top stood a battered angel with a broken trumpet. The whole place was of primitive simplicity, and no kind of architectural beauty. The beauty lay all without, among the Alps and pine forests that showed in front and here through open doors and windows.

It was more than an hour past mid-day when Saxon Trefalden sat thus before the organ, and his cousin had not yet come to claim his company. His thoughts were busy, and his soul was disquieted within him. The uneasiness that he had felt on leaving those two to their solitary conference had returned with tenfold force. Why was he excluded from it? And why should his uncle, who had never, as he believed, hidden a thought from him before, keep a secret from him now?

Then, what of this unknown kinsman, William Trefalden, of London? Did Saxon really like him? The question was a difficult one. He scarcely knew how to answer it, even to himself. He thought he liked his cousin. Nay, he felt sure—almost sure—that he liked him. Not, perhaps, quite so well to-day as yesterday. Was it that an indefinable sense of mistrust mingled with the liking? No, that was impossible. His generous nature revolted at the thought. Was it that William Trefalden's opinions were so new to him, and went so far to unsettle his own preconceived notions of good and evil? Or was it that he was himself somewhat out of humor with the world this morning—somewhat less contented than of old? The organ, to be sure, had sounded more wheezy and thin than ever today, and his own playing had seemed clumsier than usual. Besides, that matter of the twenty francs was hard to forget. Well, well, he certainly liked his cousin; and as for poverty, why he must put up with it, and make the best of it, as his father and uncle had done before him. Then with regard to Olimpia Colonna—pshaw! were she fair as Helen and patriotic as Camilla it would make no difference to him. Saxon flattered himself that he was invincible.

At the point of his meditations a shadow fell upon the threshold, and was followed by the substance of William Trefalden.

"I am ashamed, Saxon," said he, "to have kept you waiting for me so long. Your uncle is gone home, and I suppose it is too late to think of Chur to-day. Is this the organ?"

Saxon bent his head affirmatively.

"So! a fine organ, and a set of pipes, only fit for firewood? What say you? will you present the parish with a new one?"

"I hope the parish will not have to wait till I do so," replied Saxon, with a faint smile.

"But I am serious. Will you order one from Geneva, or have it brought all the way from Paris?"

"Cousin William, what do you mean?" faltered Saxon, his heart beginning to beat faster, he knew not why.

Mr. Trefalden laid his hand on the young man's shoulders, and, looking him sturdily in the face, replied:

"This is what I mean, Saxon. In three or four years' time you will be a rich man—a very rich man—richer than richer than Count Piantè or any nobleman here."

"I—rich—richer than—I do not understand you!" said Saxon, brokenly.

"It is the absolute truth."

"But my uncle—"

"He knows it. He has known it since before you were born. He desired me to tell you all the story of your inheritance."

Saxon put his hand to his forehead and turned his face aside.

"Not just yet—not here," he said, in an agitated voice. "I—I am so taken by surprise—almost terrified. Will you leave me for a few minutes? I will come out to you presently in the church-yard."

"Oh, certainly," replied Mr. Trefalden, and turned toward the door. Saxon sprang after him, and grasped him by the arm.

"One moment, cousin," said he, pointing to a little stone tablet let into the church wall about half-way between the organ and the porch. Did he leave it?

The tablet bore the name of Saxon Trefalden, and the date of his death.

"Your father, not your uncle both knew it," replied Mr. Trefalden, gravely. "This fortune would have been his now, instead of yours, if he had lived to claim it."

Saxon turned away with a deep sob, and his cousin went out into the sunshine.

Left alone in the little silent church, the young man covered his face with his hands and buried his tears.

"God help me!" murmured he. "What shall I do? I am so young, so ignorant, so unfit to bear this! God help me, and guide me to use these riches rightly!"

And then he knelt down beside the little organ and prayed.

CHAPTER XII.

ON THE TERRACE AT CASTLETOWERS.

A BROAD gravelled terrace lying due east and west, with vases of massive terra cotta full of glossy evergreens placed at regular intervals along the verge of the broad parapet. A mighty old Elizabethan mansion of warm red brick, standing back in deep angles of shade, with all its topmost gables, carved scutcheons, and gilded vanes glittering to the morning sun. A foreground of velvet lawn, dotted here and there a holm rivulet, and rich in old gnarled oaks planted at the time of the Restoration. A distance of blue hills and purple woodlands, with the broad sheen by stretches of fir plantation jutting out into the hazy heath-land, like wooded promontories sloping to the sea. Such is the picture with which all his gorgeous plum- displayed; a lady feeding him from '. . . white hand; and two gentlemen standing by, the one a handsome dog of April, sulmy, sunny, redolent of the violet and the thorn. The county, Surrey. The place, Castletowers.

"How you flatter that bird, Mademoiselle Colonna!" said one of the gentlemen; a tall, soldierly man, with a deep scar across his left temple, and some few gray hairs silvering his thick mustache and beard. "His disposition was always a little too dove-between vanity and ill-nature; but since your advent the brute has become more detestable than ever. Take care! I never see your hand at his beak without a shudder."

"Fear not on my account, Major Vaughan," replied the lady; "and pray do not be unjust to Sardanapalus. He is quite an altered bird; and as perfect as a bird can be."

"You do well to add that clause, my dear lady; for we can all bear witness to the way in which his majesty 'takes it out' in viciousness when you are not by. He flew at Gulnare not an hour ago, down by the five oaks yonder; and I believe if I had not interposed he would have had at me. and if the mare were not the most self-possessed beast in creation, there would have been battle, murder, and sudden death between them."

"Really? You make me prouder than ever of my conquest."

The soldier shrugged his shoulders.

"Pshaw!" said he; "what is one bar on the medal, more or less, to the hero of a hundred fields?"

"Major Vaughan, you are complimentary."

"Vaughan's bayonet, you mean, my smell of powder," laughed the younger gentleman, who was leaning against the parapet close by.

"Bah! que veux-tu, mon cher? A man can no more shake off the associations of twenty years than he can shake off the bronze from his skin."

"You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will, The scent of the barrack will hang round it still."

Mademoiselle Colonna looked up quickly, still feeding the peacock from her open palm.

"I like your compliment the better, Major Vaughan, for what Lord Castletowers calls its smell of powder," said she. "It is a familiar perfume to all true patriots."

"I don't like to remember it," muttered the soldier, pulling thoughtfully at his mustache.

"No! I," said Lord Castletowers, in a low voice.

"Will you pray?" asked the lady, with a heightened color. "Is it not the incense of Italian liberty?"

"Granted; but it is an incense so powerful that fair ladies do well to smell it from a distance."

"Not when they can be of service in the temple, Major Vaughan," replied Mademoiselle Colonna, with one of her proud smiles. "But, digressions apart, do you really tell me that Sardanapalus attacked Gulnare without any kind of provocation?"

"I do, indeed."

"It is strange that he should be so savage!"

"It is still more strange that he should be so docile! I believe, Mademoiselle Colonna, that you are in possession of some taming secret known only to yourself."

"Perhaps so. May I be allowed to cite you as a specimen of my success?"

Major Vaughan bowed almost to the ground.

"Oh, dear me!" said he, "you are much, much," he, "the head of thy slave is at thy disposal!"

Startled either by the Major's profound salam, or by the sudden flapping of the breakfast-bell, Sardanapalus threw up his head and uttered an angry scream. Mademoiselle Colonna withdrew her hand directly. What a fine array the reminder of the cake with which she had been feeding him. Lord Castletowers saw the gesture and sprang to her side.

"The brute has not bitten you?" he said, anxiously.

She had already wrapped her handkerchief round her hand, and was moving slowly toward the house, as if nothing had happened; but there was a slight unsteadiness in her gentle quiver in the smile with which she replied,

"Very slightly, thank you. Don't be angry with the poor dear bird. He meant no harm."

"Meant!" echoed the young man, fiercely. "I'll teach him what he means in future. Will you permit me to see the extent of the mischief?"

"Nay, it is nothing—a mere peck."

Lord Castletowers uttered an exclamation of dismay as he stooped to take something from the ground. It was a little fragment of cake all crimson dyed.

"It is no 'peck' that has done this!" he exclaimed. "It is a bite! Major Vaughan—Mademoiselle, allow me to see your hand!"

"Indeed it is not serious; but lest you should fancy I would deceive you—there!"

The blush with which she began faded quite away as she concluded, and left her somewhat paler than usual. She averted her eyes. She could bear the pain bravely enough, but not the sight.

"What is the matter?" said Major Vaughan, who had turned away on making his salam, and seen nothing of the accident.

"Sardanapalus has bitten Mademoiselle Colonna," replied Lord Castletowers, with unconcealed agitation. "Bitten her severely. See this!"

The pretty little delicate palm was half laid open, but the slender fingers did not even tremble. Major Vaughan examined the wound with the keen glance of one accustomed to such matters.

"Humph! an ugly gash!" said he; "but not so bad as a bayonet thrust after all. If you will accompany me to the house, mademoiselle, I will dress it for you in first-rate style. You do not know what a capital surgeon I am. Here, Castletowers—take me up the young lady's hand in the mean while!"

Lord Castletowers gave his own handkerchief, and, trembling, bound it round Mademoiselle Colonna's into his breast-pocket. Her eyes were still averted; but a dark shadow came on Major Vaughan's face.

"A thousand thanks," said she, smilingly, when the bandage was adjusted.

"You will not be able to use it is properly dressed, mademoiselle," replied he, offering her his arm. " ' 'd now, if you please, we will find our w the housekeeper's room and procure all necessary; while you, my dear fellow at better go and explain the cause of th ' ' ' that he was free to love like the Lord of Burleigh, if he chose.

It was in somewhat of this same spirit of romance that Lord Castletown had associated himself with the Italian cause. He had, or fancied that he had, a democratic bias. He was fond of quoting the examples of the classic republics; he had read Rousseau's Contrat Social, and Godwin's Political Justice; and he had a genuine English hatred of oppression, whatever its form or aspect. Unprofessional as he had been since the hour of his birth by a triple rampart of conservatism, it is possible that democracy possessed for this young nobleman somewhat of the stimulative charm of a forbidden luxury. He certainly never confided the full extent of his republican sympathies to his lady mother, and he would have been far from grateful to any officious friend who had presented her with a verbatim report of one of his most enthusiastic speeches. Those speeches were delivered at meetings held in obscure lecture-halls and institutes in unaristocratic parts of London, and were remarkably good speeches of their kind—eminently thought, and often felicitously expressed; but their eloquence, nevertheless, was by no means calculated to gratify the Countess of Castletowns.

On all questions of English polity Lord Castletowns was what is somewhat vaguely called a "liberal conservative;" on all Italian subjects, a thorough-going Puritanic rouge. His youth had more hard-worked universal suffrage in his own country than he would have countenanced slavery in Venice; but he firmly believed in the possible regeneration of the great Roman republic, and avowed that belief with unhesitating enthusiasm. Besides, his old college tastes and associations were yet fresh upon him, and he entertained all a young man's admiration for the Latin literature, and historians. Over these his sympathies all so classical and remote. He was keenly susceptible to those influences which beset the vivid amateur of books and art. He had loitered, sketched, and dreamed away more than one winter among the palaces of Florence and Rome. He had read Petrarch, and Boccaccio, and the most amusing parts of Dante. He had been in love, though never, perhaps, very deeply, with each one of the Grand Gioliettas of his time. He had written canzonets in which amore rhymed to core in the orthodox fashion, and had sung them by moonlight under picturesque balconies over and over again, in many a stately old Italian city. Above all, he had known Giulio Colonna from his school boyhood, and had been, as he was, inoculated with Italian patriotism ever to the most particular point. Accordingly, as regard Signor Colonna not only as some kind of distant cousin, but also as one of his mother's most frequent guests, he had accepted all his opinions with the unquestioning faith of childhood. He had, indeed, listened to the magic of his eloquence long before he was old enough to understand its force and purport, and had become insensibly educated in the love and reverence of those things which were to him as Colonna as the life of his life. It was, therefore, no wonder that the young Earl proved, as he grew to manhood, a stanch friend to the Italian cause. It was no wonder that he made enthusiastic speeches at obscure meetings, transacted a vast amount of really hard work in the capacity of Honorary Secretary to the Central Committee, and believed in Giulio Colonna and the great Italian republic of the future with all his heart and soul.

There was, in reality, no blood relationship whatever between the Castletowns family and this branch of the Colonnas. A Miss Holme-Pierpoint had married a Prince Colonna some twenty-five or thirty years before; but she was long since dead, and had left no children. A pleasant intercourse had subsisted, however, between the two families ever since. The Colonnas, down to the third and fourth generation, were regularly welcomed at the great old Surrey mansion whenever any of them came to England; Lady Castletowns and her son had once spent six delightful months of villeggiatura with the Colonna's Alban Villa; and when the young Earl was in Rome he had been the very life and soul of all the winter entertainments given at this stately palazzo which stands in the Corso at the corner of the Piazza di Santissimi Apostoli. So for Giulio Colonna, he had been friendship and son ever since the Honorable Alethea Pierpoint had exchanged her name for that of Prince Colonna—and that had been limited to a mention in the house of her lolyship's father. He was one of the very few whom the countess really valued, and with whom she condescended to be on a perfectly equal footing. Perhaps he was the only person upon earth with whom she had a real unreserved confidence. It was to him that she had turned for help in her matrimonial troubles; for counsel respecting the education of her son; for sympathy when any of her ambitious projects failed of success. She had known him, indeed, from her girlhood. She admired his great and varied talents. She had perfect reliance on his probity and honor; and she respected his religious views. To certain of these she respected his patriotic devotion as well; though, it is almost needless to add, she was wholly at issue with him in the matter of his policy of republicanism.

"It is a point," she used to observe, "upon which my good friend, Signor Colonna, is dead. I grieve to say, alike to reason and good taste. He has so imbued himself with the classical history of his country that he can no longer discriminate between the necessities of a semi-barbarous race and those of a highly-civilized people. He can not see that the monarchical form of government is precisely that which the age demands. I am very sorry for him. I have represented the matter to him over and over again from every conceivable point of view, but with unvarying ill-success. I am weary of trying to convince a man who shuts his ears to conviction."

And when she had said this, or words to this effect, Lady Castletowns would sigh, and drop the subject with the air of one who had exhausted it utterly.

JANET.

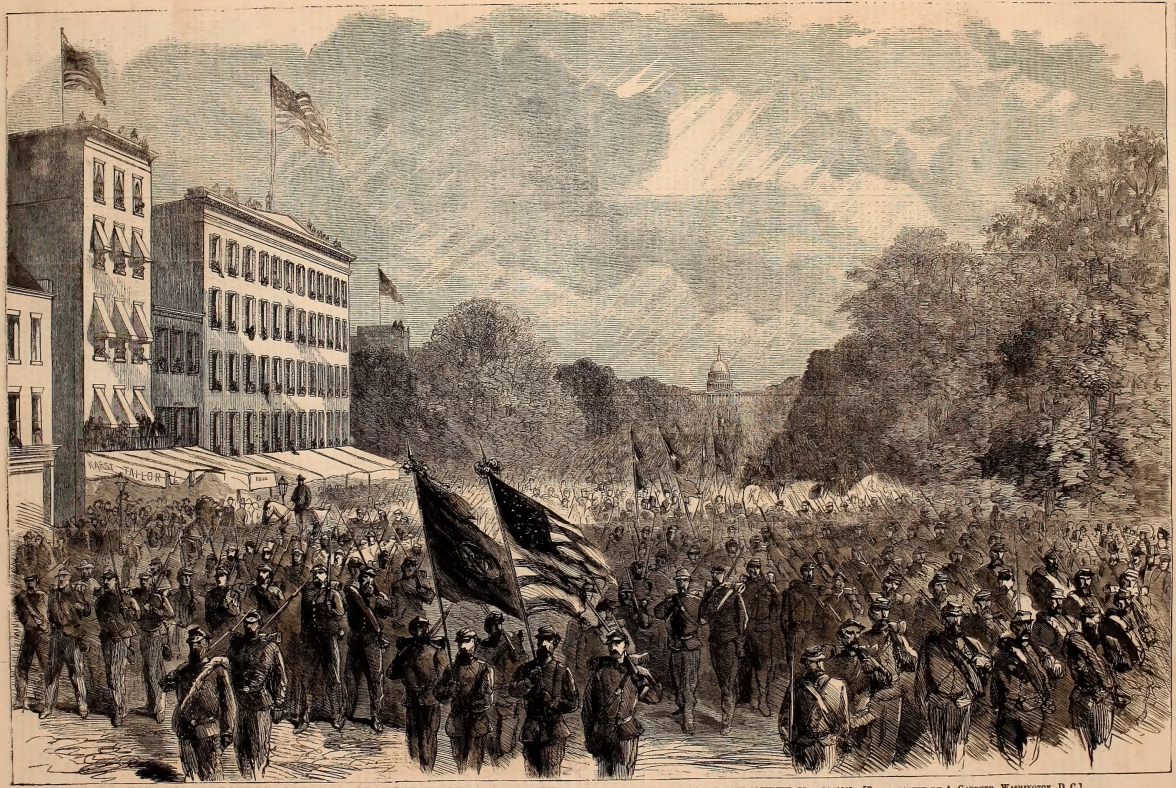
"What ails thee, daughter Janet,
That your cheek s so full of woe?
When as morn you set to water,
Your face was all aglow;
Your lips were red as cherries,
Your eye was bright and clear.
What ails thee, daughter Janet?
Come, tell your mother dear."

"Oh! I took my eggs to market,
And I sold them at the fair,
When who but Rob the Miller
Should ask me for my share;
He took me up behind him,
And the maids did flout and jeer,
Is it thus I'm to be laughed at?
Is it right, say mother dear?"

"Don't be foolish, daughter Janet,
You are old enough to tell,
Many take their eggs to market
Who have more than eggs to sell;
The Miller he is handsome,
And he's rich, and he's free,
And you'll always ride to market,
If he weds you, daughter dear."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

FIRST ENDOWMENT.—Repetition is the thief of edgar tions in sermons is generally the thief of sleep. It is with pleasure as with sparkling wines. You can have too much. Some, indeed, like it flat. Some like it brewed, but once. Cork up your wine for after use, and the next thought you will have is of a headache. Repeat and tastelessness. Take a second sip at any joy the earth affords, and you will find it less entertaining than the first. Variety is the spice of life. No secondary sensations are like the primitive. Hence, in the days when every luxury, Middle-aged reader, do you remember the pride with which you wore your first vest? You may have been a chesp affair, always at odds with Chronos, and the golden buttons may have been counterfeit; but the possession, it may be a patent lever, richly jewelled. But what a contrast between the indifference with which you now forth the vanity watch of your maturity, and the subdued exultation with which you displayed your first vest, paraded the valueless trinket of your hobbledehoyhood! Probably your first vest and your first watch were contemporaneous—they generally are. Have you forgotten the twelve-years-old vest for whose sake you endured the rubbings and moped disconsolate in solitary places, and coveted unattainable pleasures? Is any pleasure like the first vest-ing one? Do not rest satisfied with the thrilling moment when the consciousness of vesting to a man first dawns on you. Repeat it. Of course you do. A dozen tides of passion may have swamped the memory of your first vest, but it will have swished away the memory of your "calf love." The affection of your youth is a sweet and cherished reminiscence that will be likely enough to outlive the better conveyed to your heart-strings by your children and daughters, can you say conscientiously that you welcomed the second vest as you welcomed the first? Candidly, no. True, you may love them all dearly, but did not the first baby bring the deepest love? Was not the first vest distinct among them all; or, rather, did it not set allowing that horizon of happiness within which love ever after moved and responded with a new gush to every new claim? What is all the "vesting" of later life compared with that of our earlier years? Does the veteran feel as proud of his many uniforms as he does of his first suit of regimentals? Is any after-affluence of crinoline equal to the first hoop-skirt, scanty though it be? Is any garment more soul-compelling of creating the same sensations in the wearer as the first coat that mantled the back of man? Is any other manhood author experience more delight in seeing his initial work in print than the veteran litterateur in seeing his last in a twentieth volume? Life has many pleasures that will not perfectly bear repetition, but, unimpaired, but the first things of the flock are always the sweetest.

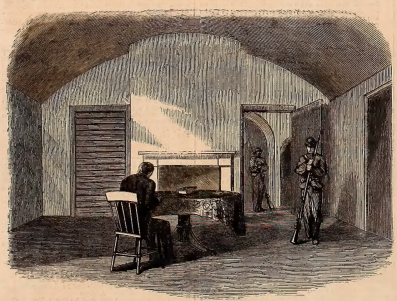


THE EFFECT OF DIET.—Dieting is usually considered to mean the starving of a body into health. But the way in which the educated physician attaches to the term is a judicious adaptation of the various properties of food to food, according to the circumstances of each case. A healthy man is dieted when he is made to live very well; an invalid may diet with a view to the recovery of his health; even the things eaten by the sick are chosen for their nature, bulk, and mode of preparation. A vast multitude are suffering from the effects of wrong dieting, and we are precisely alike in all points, since there is an endless variety in constitutions as to the digestion of certain substances, etc. Yet dyspepsia is always brought on by over and improper eating, and it is the curse of the age. No one in a generation if the children were educated to eat moderately, regularly, and slowly, of plain food only. We will do their offspring a higher good than by leaving them large fortunes. Let us, then, educate our boys from their infancy, and every evil thing. As the rich can not be always eating, so they can not be always drinking. But with indulged children, bring on dyspepsia by eating intemperately, and you will soon find that intemperance will have to work for a living—induce the horrible disease by eating hastily as well as intemperately, and you will find eating heartily at supper, and going to bed within an hour or two afterward. The habit of eating too much and too rapidly is a generation if the children were educated to eat moderately, regularly, and slowly, of plain food only. We will do their offspring a higher good than by leaving them large fortunes. Let us, then, educate our boys from their infancy, and every evil thing. As the rich can not be always eating, so they can not be always drinking. But with indulged children, bring on dyspepsia by eating intemperately, and you will soon find that intemperance will have to work for a living—induce the horrible disease by eating hastily as well as intemperately, and you will find eating heartily at supper, and going to bed within an hour or two afterward. The habit of eating too much and too rapidly is a vice of the age, and it is the more dangerous vigor there may not be a while be noticed any special ill effects from such a practice. But the habit is quite precisely, but it is cumulative, and impossible not to mentally dwell in the end.

TOO CLEVER BY HALF.—A Russian soldier recently, while enjoying himself at a rustic ball in one of the Polish villages, boasted that he could shoot a bullet through a man's hat at one hundred paces without touching his head. A peasant accepted the challenge, and, at the word of the marksman, squeezed his hat so low down over his eyes that the bullet passed through the crown, and left him not a corpse on the ground. The soldier was sentenced to the punishment of the knout, which was administered to him as appealed against his sentence, alleging that the fault was in the measurements, and that the peasant had not kept the agreement with the judge, providing the latter did not "measure his head as well as his hat." Punch, from which we extract the story, does not inform us whether the learned Russian commentator was one of very liberal offer.

THE WORST OF IT.—The worship is prevalent all over the North; you have Fie morning, noon, and night every day in the week, and Sundays, too, if you happen to be above board in Fie. It can be eaten stealthily and in secret. A slice of a cod Pie is never missed. We have heard of young ladies who took Fie to bed with them. The "Confessions of a Fie-Eater" have just been published. They are heart-rending. Through an unconquerable hunger for Fie, the writer had run wise in their subject often incurred in infancy the penal visitation of hickory, and brought the latter to a premature and untimely end—to the grave. He wasted in gormandizing Fie those precious hours which should be employed in study. He study: at the end, not only failed to graduate at West Point, but even to marry a niece of the late Daniel Webster. Pie darkened his mind, crippled his faculties, paralyzed his energy. For three years he was a contented and unobtrusive career for an unsuccessful whaling voyage from Cape Cod. Pie drove him into exile. Hendered to all the finer moral feelings by this ungovernable lust for Pie, he obtained, under false and fraudulent pretenses, a through ticket for California by the Vanderbilt line; but, deserted in the middle of the Isthmus of Darien by all the Chinese table in San Francisco, he was disgracefully expelled the Golden State. It was from starving Pie—a digger's necessities himself—that he subsequently expelled the Golden State. Beggared, broken in health, he deserted his wife and family, drew checks upon wife-at-home to the amount of the Bell and Everett vote, all in consequence of Pie. At length, after a course of "skinning" and "flaying" Pie, in quest of Gooseberry Pie, and visiting the hideous most with Dead Rabbits, Plug-Uglies, and other dangerous politicians, he was arrested in Philadelphia for passing bogus notes on the Bank of Kensington, and was sent to State Prison for five years. All owing to Pie.

A CHRISTMAS DAY IN OLDEN TIME.—James, Earl of Lauadale, sent a Christmas pie to King George III., which contained 9 geese, 5 wild ducks, 5 turkeys, 4 fowls, 2 pigeons, 6 rabbits, 3 teals, 3 starlings, 1 partridge, 10 woodcocks, 3 Guinea fowls, 3 snipes, 6 plovers, 4 waterhens, 1 bittern, 2 curlews, 2 landrails, 1 pheasant, 1 heron, 18 chickens, 2 pheasants, 2 turkeys, 12 fieldfares, 6 blackbirds, 10 rabbits, 1 leg of venison, half a bullock, 3 loaves of flour, and 1 cabbage. It weighed 32 stones, was carved at the table of the king by the Earl of Lauadale, and daintily as the celebrated pie containing four-and-twenty blackbirds, which, when the pie was opened, began to sing, it was, at all events, a "dish to set before a king."



EVENS AND ODDS.—Betting becomes a vice of popular, almost national faith, that it is not possible to be truly happy unless you are betting. Betting makes excitement, they are by no means exclusively the lowest—drink is the legitimate vice of every thing. The very use of liquor is held to be synonymous with enjoyment, and this doctor tells you that there is in print and written. Yet every man who is not a downright drunkard is well aware that the habit of drinking six, ten, twenty times a day, small, is a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. I put it to any one who does not drink, to any who has, or at odd late nights in a club-room, drinking, smoking, and bandying reckless jokes, the consequence of such an evening is, can any thing like that of a few quiet hours spent at home with a book, or in conversation with intimate and virtuous learners pleasure upon the health is too obvious to be denied for a moment. The many natures of the drinking ones themselves would be undeniable also if the persons who drank could be induced to give answers to them in the truth out of sight. No one ever brought any good out of a drinking bout yet, and without forcible proofs to the contrary, I shall leave nothing behind but morose-ness, regret, bad temper, and confirmed bad headache

DAVIS'S CELL AT FORTRESS MONROE.

CORRIDOR LEADING TO DAVIS'S CELL IN FORTRESS MONROE.

DAVID C. HAROLD.

DAVID C. HAROLD, now on trial before the military court-martial at Washington as the accomplice of BOOTH in the assassination of President LINCOLN, was born in Maryland about 1842. He received his education at Charlotte Hall, in St. Mary's County. His father was a respectable citizen, residing for many years in Washington, and holding the position of principal clerk in the Naval Store. Young HAROLD was on the most intimate terms with BOOTH for several months previous to the assassination. His knowledge of the topography of the lower portion of Maryland made him an excellent guide for BOOTH. He was an indolent, dissipated fellow—just such a tool as the Confederates would have chosen for secret service or BOOTH for an instrument. He lacks the hardened nature which would be developed by a more active criminal career, frequently gives way to weeping, and is a coward in the face of danger or possible death. Much of this, however, is to be laid to his extreme youth, he being now not more than twenty-three years of age.

The evidence against HAROLD is no doubt conclusive. He had a perfect acquaintance with BOOTH's designs, and did not hesitate to admit to rebel soldiers whom he encountered in making his escape that he and BOOTH had killed President LINCOLN. His name must be added to the infamous list containing the names of BELL and KENNEDY, and at the head of whom it was BOOTH's ambition that his name might be recorded. The precise part which HAROLD played in the assassination, or the nature of the relationship existing between him and BOOTH, is still left much in the dark. BOOTH, just before his death, protested strongly to HAROLD's perfect innocence of the crime, though he appeared to be disgusted with his comrade's cowardice.

Purify and Increase

YOUR STOCK OF

PURE BLOOD.

Every individual, even the most diseased, has within him a germ or root of that original pure blood of our common mother, Eve; which germ of pure blood is the superior of his ills, and is to be contacted through the love of the heterogeneous corrupt humors which are the causes of disease in the individual. By purging the body of this diseased individuality of its bad humors, you allow the germ of pure blood to gain ground and to make blood of a better quality, and so on progressively till the whole mass is regenerated; for the good principle, or good pure blood, is always striving to be predominant over the bad or diseased humors. Let all who wish to be of a fine healthy habit—who wish to have a sound mind in a sound body—who desire to be able to stand without injury the eventual changes of this climate—who desire to have healthy children—use the Brandreth Pills, which will effectually cleanse the blood of all bad humors, and make the human body to the state of health enjoyed before the introduction of mineral medicines. Remember, Brandreth's Pills place within the reach of all health and long life.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

United States 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES,

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cents per day on a $1000 note
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already authorized, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will conduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-Thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and continuously after that date.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make the

Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days. The notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents, No. 167 Broadway, New York, guarantee that all of the above list of goods will be sold for One Dollar Each.

In compliance with the recent suggestion of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off their supply, a large quantity of valuable Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent to this country, and MUST BE SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances, ARRANDALE & CO. act-ing as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have resolved to submit to a Public Appointment, to be divided according to the following regulations:

Every person who forwards One Dollar to our envelope indiscriminately, sealed up; and, when ordered, are taken from the envelope at random, and sent by mail, the same being no favoritism. On receipt of the certificate you will note what you are to receive. It is in your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. Purchasers may in addition obtain a Gold Watch, Diamond Ring or any Set of Jewelry on our list for ONE DOLLAR. Send 25 cents for certificate.

In all transactions by mail we shall charge for forwarding the certificates, by return mail, and delay the business, 25 cents each, which must be enclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred for $15.

What the "Press" say of us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining watches, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway. They have a miscellaneous stock of articles, varying in value, and all are offered at one dollar each. The distribution is very fairly done—you agree to take a certificate of a certain article, and then you are informed of the sum required to pay your dollar unless you are satisfied with the article, which is invariably worth more than that amount, and may be $50 or $100. An excellent mode this of advertising.—The Evening Times, N. Y. Saturday, May 13, 1865.

MESSRS. ARRANDALE & Co. have long been personally known to us, and we believe them to be very way worthy of public confidence.—The Scottish Journal, London, June 11, 1864.

We are requested at the office of Arrandale & Co's Agency for European Manufacturing Jewelers, a large assortment of diamonds and other valuable jewelry of the newest patterns. We also noticed a large quantity of silver plate, and altogether a well filled stock of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a novel principle, giving great advantage to purchasers, and affording ample employment to agents. We know the firm in question to be very respectable, and of undoubted worthy of public confidence, and recommend our friends to read their advertisement.—N. Y. Atlas, May 6, 1865.

BY MESSRS. ARRANDALE & Co.'s arrangement the advantage of a choice is given to the customer, for he has every thing to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what is the set for which he is subscribing, and he need not omit it if he is not satisfied.—N. Y. Weekly News, May 6, 1865.

EMPLOYMENT FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment for ladies is to engage for the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co., at No. 167 Broadway, advertisement has been very successful in this way, not only in filling her own purse, but also in distributing the certificates. She has also sold the Certificates, as will be seen by our advertising columns, and we believe that she is now engaged.—N. Y. Evening Mercury, August 14, 1864.

In our columns to-day we will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Distribution of watches, jewelry, silver-ware, etc. The success of that advertisement we received several sets of the jewelry advertised, and we are informed in all instances it has been satisfactory; they exceeded our expectations. They turned out to be just the recipients, and some of them six times.—True American Extension, August 17, 1864.

The Bristol Times & Kingston, C. W., say, Nov. 26, 1864, one of our lady subscribers became an agent for Arrandale & Co., and in a few days brought some twenty articles, sent as prizes for her agency, to this office for inspection, and without any choice we can state that each and all of the articles were worth treble the amount of cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

We have seen some very pretty specimens of Table and Tea Spoons, Gold Watches, Ladies' Chains, Pins, Bracelets, etc., which have been sent by Arrandale & Co. to this place for $1 each.—Anglican Reporter, N. Y. State, Feb. 25, 1865.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar. Agents can obtain 25 cents for every certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

THE FATE OF DAVIS.

THE attempt is useless to compare JEFFERSON DAVIS with other noted political offenders. The London Saturday Review, one of our most scurrilous enemies, says that he is no more guilty than WASHINGTON, or KOSSUTH, or GARIBALDI. The London Star, one of our truest friends, argues that every political execution, from WALLACE to JOHN BROWN, has been a mistake. But all the instances named differ essentially from the case of DAVIS. Thus the limits of the prerogative of King CHARLES FIRST had never been precisely defined, and his offences were not declared capital by any existing law. LOUIS SEIZIEME of France was not punished for his own crimes, but for those of a system of which he was a victim. The head of the Earl of STRAFFORD fell by an ex post facto law. But the case of JEFFERSON DAVIS does not resemble any of these; nor was his rebellion like that of WASHINGTON, KOSSUTH, GARIBALDI, or JOHN BROWN. They appealed to the right of revolution, and were prepared to meet the consequences of failure without trying to skulk off in petticoats. DAVIS urged the constitutional right of secession. He and his advocates claim that it was a question of constitutional interpretation. But they can not deny that he has deliberately incurred a certain penalty prescribed for a certain crime. When he put his difference of interpretation to the judgment of the sword he assumed the risk of suffering by the law if he did not overthrow the law. He arose in arms to resist the Government and destroy it. The fundamental law defines such an act as treason. The statute law awards to a citizen convicted of high treason the punishment of death. If therefore he be convicted, the remission or commutation of the penalty is purely a question of public policy. There are no private jealousies, no party hatreds, no family or dynastic pride or fear to be consulted. The sole question is, Does the national welfare require his execution?

If it does not, then it requires that treason shall cease to be a capital crime. If the treason of DAVIS—the magnificence for every element of ferocity, inhumanity, and malignity—a treason directly responsible for the untold and unimaginable cruelties practiced upon loyal citizens at the South and for the horrors of the rebel prison pens, the consequences of a deliberate policy—ought to be condoned in any degree whatever, public decency and consistency demand that the law be changed. For if there were a man convicted of a single murder without any mitigating circumstances whatever except his assertion that he had a right to commit murder, and there were a doubt in the public mind whether he ought to be hung, it is plain that the real question to be decided would be whether murder without justification or extenuation ought to be a capital crime. If such an offender were pardoned, or his punishment were commuted, there could never afterward be reason for hanging a murderer.

Is there, or ought there to be, such a doubt in the public mind in this country in regard to treason? It is a question to be discussed without passion. DAVIS is indicted for treason, not for the wholesale massacres by hunger, thirst, and disease of Fort Pillow and Andersonville which he has procured. That his execution would be lawful there is no dispute. But every thing which is lawful is not expedient. The power of pardon is designed to prevent lawful punishments which are inexpedient. Yet if in this case the lawful penalty be inexpedient, in no conceivable case of the kind can it ever be expedient.

It is useless to urge that the United States Government is now the strongest in the world, and may magnanimously dismiss a baffled conspirator with contempt. Why should it not dismiss a baffled pickpocket with contempt? It is possibly a no danger from the pickpocket. It is certainly in no danger from the conspirator. If treason be, like theft, a crime, it is as necessary that it should be punished according to law. If it be felt that it should not be punished according to law, it is because it is not regarded as a crime. When a notorious assassin who has lurked the law is finally secured and sentenced, there is no curious inquiry whether the sentence shall be executed. If BOOTH had been arrested unhurt there would have been no plea that magnanimity required his pardon or commutation of his punishment. Now the law awards the same penalty to treason as to assassination. DAVIS is as guilty as BOOTH. Why is there any question of his proper fate, unless from the conviction that treason is not considered so morally criminal as assassination?

In a case so clear and so unmitigated as DAVIS's, commutation of punishment would be a mere evasion of the law, and would be the strongest argument that the law should be changed. For we can not agree that exile would be, as claimed by some, a more impressive and useful doom than death. Whatever loyal American citizens and their friends elsewhere may think of the guilt of DAVIS, it is certainly true that there are hundreds and thousands of persons in this country who would consider themselves honored by his presence as a guest in their houses. Would the miscalled Union Club in the Fifth Avenue in New York, which refused to expel JUDAH BENJAMIN, his most wicked accomplice, be likely to refuse to entertain JEFFERSON DAVIS? Would Mr. BELMONT, the chairman of the Democratic Committee, which so unprotected LORD HARTINGTON in wearing a rebel badge in his house, probably close his doors to the chosen chief of the rebellion which Mr. BELMONT so conspicuously honored?

And if this be so at home, how much more so would it be abroad! Morally speaking, JEFFERSON DAVIS is a far more guilty man than Mr. GLADSTONE, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, saluted as the Creator of a nation. He is still the same man who was chief leader of a people who LORD PALMERSTON, the British Foreign Minister, admiringly declared were fighting for independence. If the liberal and friendly MONCKTON MILNES, now Lord HOUGHTON, invites MAZZINI and LOUIS BLANC to breakfast, and Mr. GLADSTONE bids GARIBALDI to lunch, the Tory Lord DERBY, who thinks the murder of Mr. LINCOLN a crime, would hardly hesitate to invite the unfortunate gentleman, JEFFERSON DAVIS, to dinner; and we doubt if Count BISMARCK-SCHONHAUSEN, or his friend Count GENERAL MCCLELLAN, or his friend Count FREDERICK AUGUST BELMONT, would shy in London, would decline to meet him at my Lord's table. Yet we are very sure neither of these gentlemen would have sympathized with BOOTH, who, let it be remembered, is, in the eye of the law, no guiltier than DAVIS. And why, but because they would consider JEFFERSON DAVIS not a criminal, but a political victim? As CHARLES THE SECOND in Germany, or the COUNT DE PROVENCE in Flanders, or LOUIS PHILIPPE in Claremont, DAVIS has, in London, Paris, he will not wander through the world like CAIN, nor be shunned like BENEDICT ARNOLD. He will appeal to aristocratic sympathy and Tory respect, like a fallen SEIZIEME.

It is again said that blood enough has been shed, and that we wish to see no more. But those who say this forget that the primary object of the death-penalty awarded to treason is the prevention of bloodshed. They also forget that a man who has murdered a whole family should hardly escape punishment because he has killed so many. So with the assertion that the leader of a great war can not be treated as a criminal. The framers of the Constitution were men who knew exactly what they meant. They knew that treason is in its nature an offense upon a great scale. When they contemplated the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in case of rebellion they knew treason to be possible, and they defined treason to consist in levying war; and Congress, in the full light of all such knowledge, affixed death as the penalty of treason.

If, then, as our foreign friends, like the London Star and others, suppose, it would be wise and proper for the United States Government to save the life of DAVIS, it is equally wise that treason in England should cease to be a capital crime, for no reasons against the Government can be so black as his; and treason against this Government is more inexcusable than against any other. But the truth is, that if the public conviction does not justify the law that punishes treason with death the law shall be changed. If it is to be unchanged, it is not necessary for the validity of the law that all convicted traitors shall be hung; but it is surely necessary for the purpose of the law that all shall not escape.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

UPON the first page of this paper is the latest portrait of WILLIAM HENRY SEWARD, Secretary of State. His place in our history is secure. An early disciple of JEFFERSON and JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, faithful to the fundamental, inherent principle of equal rights before the law, Mr. SEWARD's public career, begun at an early age, has been conspicuous and illustrious. His true and popular statesmanship, as well as his profound views of the correct theory of civil war. The event of every war is uncertain, and, firm as his faith in the popular system and the sure victory of liberty was, he evidently feared to take a terrible risk if it could be fairly avoided. Moreover, he knew that neither physically nor morally was the country ready for the war, and that delay was invaluable. He spoke, too, as a representative leader, and a part of the new administration. If his tone were mild the moderation of the new policy would be inferred, and the plans of the conspirators would be so far baffled.

It was the fashion in Congress to call him a doctrinaire, a theorist, a dreamer. That criticism is absurd. The Secretary of State he has been suspected of an unwonted conservatism. But it is beyond question that he thought with Mr. LINCOLN upon the grave points of domestic policy. Our foreign relations, which are his peculiar care, he has managed with consummate skill. The task of a Secretary of State was at times very difficult and delicate; it was never more successfully performed. After all objections are made, it will be plain that, but for his prompt conduct, when other powers would have gladly interfered, he stayed their hands and kept the peace of the world.

Indeed, when Mr. SEWARD's life comes to be written—and may that task be deferred for many a year—the judgment of impatience and half knowledge will be revised. Then in due order will appear his noble and illustrious services as a public speaker, clearly asserting, amidst the loud tumult of a false Democracy and the resale of a timid Whiggery, the original rights and the immortal equality of man. He firmly struck the old key-note of the American doctrine so long forgotten, and charmed the national heart into glad response to the native melody of liberty. Then he met the assassin's blow to show how he was hated by slavery; but it may serve to teach those who seem sometimes prone to follow the lawless lead to humane, to his principles, and to all his life, that those who are still unswervingly faithful to slavery believe him no less true to liberty. During his war his fame for success has been so jubilant that it was almost a jest. But he has lived to see the war ended, the Union maintained, its inseparableness and the spirit of the Government and of the Constitution vindicated, and slavery abolished. May he live also to see every innocent free citizen of the United States enjoying his rightful share of political power!

REORGANIZATION OF STATES.

THAT the loyal freemen of a rebellious State who have fought bravely for the Government should be disfranchised, when the victory is won, by those in the same State who have fought bravely for the rebellion, is a thing to be unconquered, not because they are converted, is something which we have no doubt seems as monstrous to President JOHNSON as to any other loyal man. Probably his sole question in his mind undoubtedly is in what manner they shall be enfranchised. We therefore regard his proclamation for reorganization in North Carolina as tentative. It invites an expression of public opinion. The President does not assume to settle the question, for he knows that it must be settled by the people of North Carolina. Who have the right to exercise political authority there? Who are "the people" of North Carolina?

By the arrest of VANCE, duly elected Governor by the late laws of North Carolina, its late Constitution has been annulled by the National Government. The State can therefore be reorganized only by the supreme power of the Government. "The people" who are henceforth to constitute the State are to be designated by the President. The legality of the case. The national authority is clearly competent to declare that those who were voters under the late Constitution shall, under certain conditions, be the people. But its power is equally clear to declare that none of them shall make part of the people.

The plain fact is, that political power for the purpose of reorganization can be exercised only upon the terms prescribed by the National Government. The Supreme Court decided on the 9th of March, 1863, in the case of the Hiawatha, that by the laws of war every citizen in a hostile State was a public enemy. His subsequent participation in political power is therefore an act of grace, not a claim of right; and what shall determine the limits of that grace but the will of the authority that confers it? Whatever, for instance, the late Constitution of North Carolina may ordain, no citizen in that State can vote by any enabling forces of that instrument. The State, therefore, as a political body, is to be re-created by the National Government. Otherwise it will no longer exist. But this re-creation is not restoration. The right of voting is not conferred because it was formerly enjoyed, for it is not conferred upon all, but only upon those whom the Government chooses. Many of the persons whom it shall create were, indeed, formerly voters. But they are permitted to vote now, not because they once had the right, but because they are loyal, or for some other reason. And even if it were conceded that the permission is to be viewed as the remission of a forfeited right, it is remitted upon conditions—and what is to prevent the imposition of a condition securing the enfranchisement of all the loyal freemen of the State?

We are told that "with the rehabilitation of the State the functions of course of all the revered rights of the States must revive." Undoubtedly when there is practically a State in North Carolina or elsewhere, it will have all the rights of a State. But is there a State there now, practically speaking? If there be, by what right does the United States Government prescribe the conditions of suffrage in the State? If there be a State of North Carolina, in the same sense that there is a State of New York, let the State Government have the right to settle its own internal affairs. But if the National Government may properly regulate the reorganization of North Carolina, there is, in the same sense, no State there. There are only ways of being a State in the Union. If, as is sometimes urged, one loyal man is the State when there are no other loyal citizens there, the enemies of the United States must regard him exactly as it does the State of Illinois, defending him against invasion or rebellion, but not guaranteeing to him the reserved rights of States," including the regulation of suffrage.

Such a statement is manifest nonsense. If the National Government may interfere at all, it may interfere in the manner and to the degree that seem to it advisable. The object is to bring the political community known as the State of North Carolina into proper relations with the Union. When those relations are established, but not before, it will enjoy all the rights of every State.

HARLEQUIN AND PANTALOON.

THE rebel Richmond Enquirer by an easy transition has become the New York Daily News. It is another illustration of that utterly remorseless suppression of free speech and private right of which the News has so long feelingly reminded us. For two years we have been daily informed by it that it was not permitted to call the President a tyrant, the Government a despotism, and the war wicked and shameful. For two years it has told us every morning that the minions of power prevented it from saying that MR. DAVIS was a statesman of an inconceivable purity of Christianity, and that General LEE a warrior of incomprehensible genius. It has been a truly pathetic monument of the enormities of which the journalist SAX and the editor MACKAY described in the reddest ink for those friends of freedom the London Times and Telegraph. The divine right of State sovereignty and the odious crime of maintaining a National Government have been duly set forth in the Daily News. And now that the Richmond Enquirer has absorbed it, we shall doubtless continue to be assured that the Union is a "Confederacy" at will, and that supreme State sovereignty is the original fundamental Democratic doctrine.

"Mr. Omen Puff had two votes in his voice." Let us refresh our memories with the real opinions of the Daily News, then the Richmond Enquirer, when the "original doctrine" of State sovereignty was actually put to the proof.

On the 6th of March the Richmond Enquirer asked, "Has not State sovereignty been the weakness of the South?" And during the life and death struggle, with the compress of a common danger to bind and hold together these States, this principle of State sovereignty was continually obtruding itself, delaying and preventing the legislation necessary to the common defense, impairing that authority intrusted with the general welfare, and impeding the execution of laws necessary and proper to the success of the cause, is it to be supposed that when peace returns this principle of State sovereignty will permit the Confederacy to exist one year?..... The conduct of certain States in their opposition to the laws passed for the organization of the army and the preservation of discipline, has caused many men to reconsider their long-cherished doctrine of State sovereignty, and to come to the conclusion that while in theory it is beautiful and true, in fact and practice it is utterly defective."

Thus out of its own mouth, and not only by its acts, by the words of our fathers, by the Government they made, and by the common-sense of mankind, is the wild and wicked insurrection of State sovereignty against the national power condemned.

The News has been also unsparing in its denunciation of the Lincoln Despotism, to which President JOHNSON has succeeded. The Laws and the Constitution have been ruthlessly defied, according to the Daily News, and we are all groaning under a helpless tyranny; nor will there be any true peace and prosperity until the American people are again whipped into submission by the oligarchy of Southern slave drivers. Let us then attend to the instructions of the Daily News, at that time the Richmond Enquirer, on the 25th of February of this year. It said on that day:

"The public safety is above laws and Constitution, and if a mistaken respect for the laws and the Constitution permits the public safety to be compromised, there will at once be a awful responsibility to the Executive, which will be transmitted through all time in the miserable slavery of these people and their descendants."

These are the present doctrines of the rebel Richmond Enquirer, now the New York Daily News, upon State sovereignty and the law of Public Safety. We trust they are as agreeable to all its patrons as they are to loyal citizens of the United States, whose brave brethren, while maintaining those principles, have been slaughtered in the field and murdered in the prison for four years by men stimulated to fury by the Richmond Enquirer and counted and defended by the New York Daily News.

THE DAY OF RECKONING.

AFTER the dance the piper must be paid. For four years the country has been growing apparently rich on large issues of paper-money. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $659,160,000 of legal-tender notes have been issued, and are still in circulation; to which must be added $150,000,000 of National Bank currency, and $24,600,000 of fractional currency, making over $813,760,000 of what is called money, now in the hands of the people, besides the State Bank issue. Over and above this so-called money, the people hold fully $1,720,000,000 of bonds, Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, and other evidences of public debt; all of which, for the time being, are representatives of value, and serve their owners in as good stead as so much bullion, land, or merchandise.

The effect of this vast addition to the apparent wealth of the people, in the shape of paper-money and evidences of debt, has been to increase to an astonishing extent the number of individual fortunes, and to stimulate internal traffic in a like degree. Of the former we see evidence in the fact that Government has always been able, in the darkest hours of the war, to borrow of the people from one to two millions a day—and latterly in fair times, as much as ten and twenty millions a day. No people could lend so much and so constantly unless they were accumulating wealth—real or apparent—very fast indeed. As to the development of internal trade, the following statement tells the story conclusively:

COMPARATIVE TABLE OF RAILWAY TRAFFIC AT THE COMMENCEMENT AND AT THE CLOSE OF THE QUARTER.

	April, 1861.	April, 1865.	Increase.
Chicago and Alton.	$266,259	$583,149	$197,791
Erie Railway.	541,174	1,487,129	924,946
Hudson River.	261,761	611,540	171,779
Illinois Central.	192,064	491,297	299,243
Prairie du Chien.	41,104	106,639	65,537
Michigan Southern	186,981	366,346	179,294
Michigan Central.	217,614	381,346	163,732
New York Central.	699,688	1,390,000	690,312
Fort Wayne.	127,078	238,107	111,483
Toledo and Wabash	76,714	144,081	67,737
Rock Island.	79,609	186,110	106,501
Totals.....	$3,466,359	$5,716,260	$3,250,910

It thus appears that the internal trade of the country more than doubled during the war. A part of this increase was due to the movement of troops and munitions of war for the service of Government. But by far the greater part was the fruit of the increased abundance of money, which generated trade and industry where they did not previously exist, and developed them where they had been planted before.

Now, the piper is over, and the day of reckoning and liquidation is at hand. Not only must there be no more issues of paper-money, but it is of the utmost consequence that the issues now afloat should be withdrawn as soon as Government can do so. The United States can not afford to suffer their currency to remain in a position of doubt. Pending the war, a great premium on gold was inevitable, and, under the circumstances, was perhaps no dishonor. But it will be both dishonorable, and eventually ruinous to our credit, public and private, if no steps are taken, on the restoration of peace, for the rehabilitation of the national currency. That piece of paper which the United States pronounce to be a dollar must be made worth a dollar in reality: a gold dollar, here and everywhere. So long as it is not worth a dollar in gold, so long is the Government of the United States in default: just as palpably in default as if it failed to pay the interest on its bonds.

That these views are entertained at Washington is no secret. Secretary M'CULLOCH loses no opportunity of expressing them. He has stated within a few weeks that, in his opinion, a resumption of specie payments within a very short period is by no means impossible. And, in truth, so far as the Government is concerned, it might resume much earlier than is generally expected, if the question of revenue from taxes were not to be considered. Either by a sale of bonds at market-price, with the understanding that the currency paid for them should not be reissued; or by a gradual cancellation of currency received for taxes as well as loans; or by the accumulation of a specie reserve in the sub-treasuries; or by the sale of a large quantity of cotton, confiscated from its owners at the South; or by many other methods which will readily suggest themselves to the careful observer, it is in the power of Government at an early day to make good its promises to pay, and to render its dollar worth one hundred cents in fact. But such an operation, or even an effort to resume would involve much commercial distress, and tend to reduce the revenue from taxes in clear enough; and Secretary M'CULLOCH is unwilling to have unnecessed unwillingness to precipitate measures on this account. But after all the ing of war must come, sooner or later, and pending its advent, the expense is very injurious.

We can no more expect to escape a period of commercial prostration after our paper-money inflation than we can expect to recover the reaction of our paper-money and the restoration of specie currency; that wages will fall and prices demand for labor diminish; that many of the great fortunes accumulated during the war must vanish—these are certainties so clear that no sane man will attempt to deny them. Already the indications are plain to view on the commercial horizon. Dread of the future is even now hampering and, in some degree, paralyzing business. Capital is not making people which he may have to pay in specie. The great activity in trade which followed the fall of Richmond was due to the knowledge that the fact that the country was bare of goods and every store needed replenishing, has subsided, and on all sides we hear accounts of dullness and stagnation. As the South, where relations of the United States toward cotton owners operate to check receipts of that staple. At the West complaints are heard in many places of the congestion of freights, and until the controversy culminates, as it will some time this summer, in a railroad war, we must not expect heavy receipts of produce at the sea-board. Wall Street, the unparalleled dullness prevails in every department of business, save only the subscription to the national loan. The headache to come after our debauch is kept constantly in view by all classes, and all who are prudent are setting their houses in order, to be prepared for it when it comes.

How long must they wait? How long will the people of the United States be content to exchange—in time of peace—a debt of a depreciated currency, and the curse of fluctuations in gold which convert the most legitimate operations of commerce into mere gambling transactions? We have heard much of the duty of making personal sacrifices in order to get rid of the national debt. Where is the man who would not make some sacrifice in order to get rid of—so to speak—the money he earns to the specie standard, and to know when he has got a dollar that it is really a dollar in gold—worth a dollar all over the country?

These are not pleasant reflections, and not cheerful prospects. But they can not be overlooked. Inflation is always more agreeable than contraction, and the former is always the exhilarating than headache. But he who partakes of the one must prepare for the other, under penalty of a reputation for the ugliest products to do so. We have not an immense debt to provide for, and a large portion of it is such a shape that its adjustment will involve great trouble. The sooner we buckle to our work the better for us and our children. And all unnecessary delays on the part of Government, prompted by unwillingness for the unavoidable enmunity or nervousness about the receipts from taxes, only postpone the evil day, and create a period of suspense scarcely less prejudicial to the true interests of the country than the severe revulsion which could follow a return to sound principles.

THE CONSPIRACY TRIAL.

IN the testimony of SANDFORD CONOVER, JAMES B. MERRIMAN, and RICHARD MONTGOMERY be unimpeached, the immediate complicity of JACOB THOMPSON, TUCKER, SANDERS, JEFFERSON DAVIS, and BENJAMIN in the murders of the President is established. This fact was openly discussed, and a distinct approval came from Richmond.

The other intentions of these men are also set forth in the testimony. In the absence of any other proof, there is nothing improbable in CONOVER'S statement that, at another date of this paper, and see how these same rebels treated our prisoners of war. Men who could commit crimes so unspeakable would not hesitate to cut off the water from the city of New York and poison the reservoirs, bringing the most fearful misery and suffering upon the poorest people.

It will not be long before the poor laboring men in this country, who are painfully striving to better their condition, will learn that a class of men like the late Southern slaveholders, and their agents in Canada, and their political allies in the Free States, are just as solicitous for the rights of men, and are just as democratic, as their friends and supporters Lord PALMERSTON and the British aristocracy—and no more.

REPUDIATION.

THE Telegraph has deceived us so often that we decline to believe its report of a late speech of Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, which makes him say that he is willing the American people to repudiate their honest debts. That WENDELL PHILLIPS counsels morality is impossible. He may have said that unless all the forms of selfishness, of which the spirit and the war has been, in vain, and is, in a sense, a moral fraud. But that he said that the poor widows and mothers of soldiers, who were solemnly promised to pay for their services, and who died in the performance of their duty, shall starve, unless the Government enfranchises the colored men in North Carolina, we do not believe. If we are mistaken our readers shall know it.

"THE CHICAGO REPUBLICAN."

THE HON. CHARLES A. DANA, late Assistant Secretary of War, is editor in chief of the new paper in whose first number this title. Mr. DANA has remarkable qualifications for such a position. His great experience as the managing editor of the New York Tribune—his wide acquaintance with public men and intimate knowledge of public affairs—his generous and varied scholarship—his profound faith in the true American doctrine of equal rights—his clear and alert intellect—his prompt and incisive judgment—his brilliant and vigorous style as a writer—his marvelous executive faculty—all indicate him as peculiarly the man for the place. We heartily welcome him back again to his old career, and gladly anticipate the new advantage it insures to the good old cause.

BASE-BALL.

THE Athletic Base-Ball Club of Philadelphia comes to New York on the 12th of June to play with various clubs in the city and vicinity, and will then return to receive visits at home from their friendly rivals. The skill of these athletes are most attractive. They are sometimes witnessed by not less than ten thousand persons, including ladies. There is no more manly game than base-ball, and the more it is cultivated the better for the country. The constantly increasing love for athletic exercises produces an unusual interest in the visit of the Philadelphia champions, who "most positively decline entertainments," and who will be most heartily welcomed.

LITERARY.

"Life of Abraham Lincoln," by FRANK CROSBY, of the Philadelphia Bar (J. E. POTTER & CO., Philadelphia), "with a sketch of his county volume does not pretend to write the full biography of Mr. LINCOLN, which can not yet be properly written; but he has prepared a sketch of his public career from the beginning to the end, and includes in it all the chief speeches and documents of the late President. It is a very timely, useful, and convenient book.

We must say another word in praise of "The Published Calendar," which is promptly published every month by G. W. CHILDS, of Philadelphia, and which contains, besides a valuable list of the month's publications in the United States and England, and the announcements of works to be published, notices of new books and current events, an interesting letter from Mr. BROWNE, the London full of literary gossip not found elsewhere. The last number reprints a letter of Mr. BROWNE, on the bibliographic author of the Dictionary of Authors, that he is now engaged, and has been for six months, on the letter W, and that the twelfth part of his labor will probably complete his truly invaluable work. "The letter S alone," says Dr. ALLIBONE, "(there is about the same number of words in one short twenty-two months, working as a rule from 9 A.M. to 6 and later P.M., with intervals for meals," etc.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S REPORT.

UNDER date of May 2 General SHERMAN submitted to Lieut.-General Grant a report of his operations against Lieut.-General Johnston and his army with Gen. Grant's indorsement. He has received the news of the battles about Petersburg April 2, and that he has ordered Johnston's Petersburg April 2, and that he has ordered Johnston's force to leave him 25,000 infantry with five six to ten thousand cavalry. He will follow Johnston's retreating army and, pressing rapidly upon Greensborough, and Sherman was pursuing with as much promptness as circumstances allowed. Sherman also offers the mode about this time by General Halleck to relieve him of the task of settling the terms of the rebel army on any command," he says, "that General Halleck's troops can command," he says, "that General Halleck's troops can command him, but there is no time to be lost in the matter. Or it may be that General Halleck can inspire his subordinates with more confidence in his views, save and except in this instance, when he has twice in April [illegible] Johnston made the first proposal looking to [illegible] Johnston made the first proposal looking to [illegible] ton, Sherman agreed to meet the rebel General on the 17th, but in the mean time went on with his preparations for an action. At noon on the day appointed the two Generals met. This was the first time Sherman had ever seen Johnston. "Our interview," he says, "was frank and soldier-like, and he gave me to understand that further war on the part of the Confederate troops was folly; that the cause was lost: and that every life sacrificed after the surrender of Lee's army was the highest possible crime. He admitted that the terms conceded to General Lee were magnanimous and all he could ask, but he did want some general concessions that would enable him to allay the natural fears and anxieties of his followers, and enable him to maintain his control over them until they could be conducted to their homes and lands." Sherman, knowing the State of North Carolina the devastation inevitably to result from pursuing his sun loss and exposure of the spot, and our pursuit across the State. He also wanted to embrace the same general opportunity to dispose of all the Confederate armies that remained in existence. I drew up and submitted as follows as to his own mind, reserved to deal finally and authoritatively in regard to any other; but it did seem to me that the best way to prevent a renewal of the war might be deemed valuable to the Government of the United States, and was at least worthy the experiment could be consumed in reference. To push on, says that would be submitted to me freely and frankly to submit to military negotiations had not come to his knowledge. His main object was to prevent the dispersion of Johnston's army.

As soon as his disapprobation of the memorandum was known to him General Sherman notified Johnston of the suspension of hostilities, and on the 18th of April Johnston surrendered on the terms granted to Lee. The rebel General was not aware of Grant's presence at Raleigh.

"General Sherman complains, with some degree of justice, of the haste with which his memorandum was published and commented upon as if he were aware of the President's letter to General Grant, when General Sherman knew he had never seen or heard of the letter. He also complains of the contentious parade which was made of General Halleck's dispatches to Sherman's subordinate officers advising him of the terms of Johnston's surrender.

In regard to Stanton's publication of his memorandum General Sherman says: "On the evening of the 24 of April I returned to Milton Head, and there for the first time received the New York papers of April 28, containing Secretary Stanton's charges of aims on the part of April to General Dix, including General Halleck's from Richmond to Sherman, in which he was ordered to have been rushed with extreme haste before an existent public, viz.: memorandum of March. You will recall from the dates that these dispatches were running back and forth from Richmond and Washington to New York and there published while General Grant and I were together in Raleigh, North Carolina, agreeing to the terms on which the terms of surrender of the only remaining formidable rebel army in existence in the field, that of Joseph E. Johnston, in North Carolina, and Georgia, and Alabama, and Mississippi, were made. In all these letters I had stated clearly and distinctly that Johnston's army would not be left to disperse with their arms and scatter into small and dangerous guerrilla parties, as injurious to the United States as to the people themselves: I also further admitted that the rebel cause of the South was abandoned, that the supreme power, and that there was no use for a war any more favorable to a lasting peace. I say all these opinions of mine were known to the public only with a reversing purpose. And I do contend that my official experience and observation as well as my position as the trusted friend of the people and geography of the South, entitled my opinions to at least a decent respect."

A CORRECTION.

In our last number we stated that the Second Army Corps was commanded by General Hancock. It is a mistake which we made inadvertently. From its organization until the battle of Antietam it was always commanded by General E. V. Sumner. General French commanded a brigade in that corps.

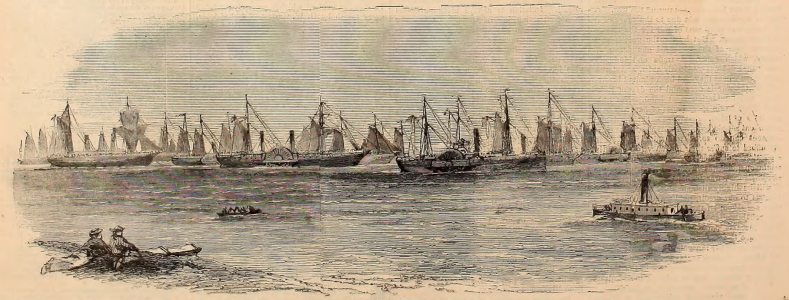
FOREIGN NEWS.

THE English Government has determined to modify the order of January 30, 1865, by removing the restrictions placed upon American vessels. The modification will bear date May 11.



The most considerable excitement in Europe recently in prospect of trouble between France and the United States. The people have not forgotten the sympathy of intelligence from this country. Prince Napoleon, in a speech delivered at the anniversary ceremony of the removal to to Napoleon I. at Ajaccio, eulogized the Democracy and Constitutional Liberty of America, and the Republican doctrine.

Garibaldi recently addressed a letter to the editors of the London Public Opinion on the relations between England and America. After expressing his wonder that the people who first established the principle of emancipation did not more positively encourage the same principle in America, he thus concludes:

"Let the United States of the ocean agree, then, for the good of oppressed humanity! Some of the same mother, may be the sister nations. Both were in their origin the heirs of the spirit of nations, and that despotism forsook dismembered Europe to establish itself. Let them unite, and I know that, if they were on good terms, it would be impossible for a few execrable intriguers, which are fatal to liberty every where."

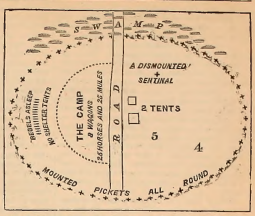
[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN AT THE WAR DEPARTMENT BY ALEXANDER GARDNER.]

CAPTURE OF DAVIS.

THERE is no longer any doubt about DAVIS having been disguised in woman's clothes at the time of his capture. Major-General WILSON confirms what he first gave us a report:

"The story of DAVIS's ignoble attempt at flight is even more ignoble than I told it. Mrs. DAVIS and her sister, Miss HOWELL, after having clothed him in the dress of the former, and put on his head a woman's head-dress, started out, one holding each arm, and brought Colonel PRITCHARD's men, in most piteous terms, to let them take their 'poor old mother out of the way of the firing.'



"Mrs. DAVIS said, 'Oh! do let us pass with our poor old mother, who is so frightened and fears to be killed.' One of PRITCHARD's men, catching sight of the 'President's' boots below the skirts of the dress, suspected at once who the poor old mother was, and replied, 'Oh no! you don't play that game on us; them boots don't look very much like they belonged to a woman. Come down, old fellow!'

"The party reached here at 2 P. M. this afternoon, took dinner at my head-quarters, and after dinner I received Mr. DAVIS at my head-quarters. Our conversation was mostly about West Point, the army, the surrender of Dick TAYLOR, the assassination of Mr. LINCOLN; and the journey North. During the conversation he brought in his little son JEFF and introduced him.

"He remarked, with a smile, that he thought the United States would find graver charges against him than the murder of Mr. LINCOLN, and seemed to regret that Mr. LINCOLN had been killed. He has asked no favors, but Mrs. D. insinuates once in a while that the 'President' is not treated with becoming dignity."

DAVIS was captured in a deep pine forest in the gray of the morning. We give in the subjoined cut a sketch of the scene of his capture. We also give on this page portraits of the officers engaged in the capture.

The clothes in which DAVIS was taken, and of which we give an illustration, consisted of a long gray cloak with sleeves, and a black shawl with orange border.

THE SCENE OF DAVIS'S CAPTURE, NEAR IRWINVILLE, GA.

THE TEXAS EXPEDITION.

We give on page 372 an illustration of the fleet which has already started for the Gulf. Its original design has been considerably modified by KIRBY SMITH's surrender. The expedition, under the command of General GOURDEY WEITZEL, has been for some time fitting out at Hampton Roads. It takes out the Twenty-fifth Army Corps.

Preparatory to its sailing orders were issued to the commanding officer on board each vessel to proceed first to Mobile Bay, in the vicinity of Forts Morgan and Gaines, with the view if making a rendezvous at that harbor, in order to coal the steamers, and to thoroughly cleanse them before proceeding any further southward.

The steamers composing this expedition fleet are among the largest and best adapted to a long sea voyage of any known to the mercantile service, and were chartered especially by the different quartermasters in New York and Philadelphia.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

THE panoramic View of Richmond given on pages 376 and 377 is now of great interest. No spot within the limits of the territory lately included in the rebellion is invested with so much importance. The war began almost with an attempt to capture Richmond. To effect that object a score of great battles have been fought, and army after army has been raised. The whole war in the West was a gigantic flank movement on Richmond.

The population of Richmond before the war had increased to between 30,000 and 40,000. The city is located on the west side of the James River, and 150 miles above its mouth. Directly opposite is Manchester, with which it is connected by two bridges. The city is spread over two hills, the Richmond and Shockoe. The elevations present many very picturesque views of the city, the river, and the surrounding country. The streets cross at right angles, and the city is supplied with gas. The Capitol stands on Shockoe Hill, in the centre of a public square. In the centre of a spacious hall in the middle of the building stands a marble statue of WASHINGTON, near which is a marble bust of LAFAYETTE. Fronting Capitol Square is the City Hall. Richmond is an important railroad centre, and the river and canal increase the facilities for commerce.

We give on page 381 an interesting sketch of rebel soldiers subscribing to the oath of allegiance. The scene of the picture is the Senate Chamber of the late Rebel Congress at Richmond.

OFFICERS ENGAGED IN THE CAPTURE OF DAVIS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, AND PUBLISHED BY PHILP & SOLOMONS, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

THE trial of the conspirators for the assassination of President LINCOLN is now nearly concluded. The evidence which during the past week has been introduced for the defense is entirely negative, with the exception of an abortive attempt to establish, in behalf of PAYNE, a plea for insanity. There has been no sort of necessity for protracting the trial by evidence of the character offered for the defense. But this delay has not been entirely unprofitable to the prosecuting attorney, as it has enabled him to introduce much testimony corroboratory to that already given. The failure of counsel to secure for the publication of the remaining portion of the reserved evidence taken on the first days of the trial. This testimony is very important, and is conclusive as to the complicity of the rebel authorities in the assassination, as also in other most heinous plots against the life of our citizens. The object for the reservation of the testimony was to secure the safety of the witnesses—CONOVER, MERRITT, and MOSTCONERY.

SANFORD CONOVER, the most prominent of these witnesses, is a native of New York State. He has resided in Canada since October, 1864. He testifies that he was conscripted into the Confederate army, and detailed to service in the rebel War Department and Bureau of Secret Service, under JAMES A. SEDDON, the Secretary of War, and that while in Canada he was intimately acquainted with GEORGE N. SANDERS, JACOB THOMPSON, DR. BLACKBURN, BEVERLY TUCKER, WILLIAM C. CLEARY, CLEMENT C. CLAY, and others. He knew SURRATT also, and thinks that HE saw SURRATT in Canada on several occasions last April in THOMPSON'S room, also in the company of SANDERS and other rebel agents. The latter part of April he saw him in company with THOMPSON, SANDERS, and BOOTH. He saw SURRATT at that time deliver dispatches from Richmond to THOMPSON. These dispatches were from BENJAMIN and DAVIS—that from the latter being either a cipher dispatch or a letter. Previous to this occasion THOMPSON had conversed with CONOVER upon the subject of a plot to assassinate President LINCOLN and his Cabinet. He corresponded at that time with the New York Tribune, receiving compensation from that journal. In one of his letters he gave warning of the existence of a plot to assassinate the President. This letter, it appears, failed to reach the Tribune. One letter was received, however, containing intimation of a plot to kidnap the President, with a suggestion of his possible murder. CONOVER invited CONOVER to take part in this enterprise. When SURRATT delivered the messages above alluded to THOMPSON said his hand upon the paper and said, referring to the assassination and to the assent of the rebel authorities, "This makes the thing all right." The dispatches or spoke of a person to be assassinated. LINCOLN, MR. JOHNSON, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, Judge CHASE, and General GRANT. THOMPSON said on that occasion, or on the day before that interview, that the assassination proposed would leave the Government of the United States entirely without a head, that there was no provision in the Constitution of the United States by which they could elect another President, that WELLES was a nonentity, and MR. THOMPSON said it was not worth while to kill him; he was of no consequence.

CONOVER'S first interview with THOMPSON on the subject was early in February, in THOMPSON'S room in St. Lawrence Hall, Montreal. On that occasion THOMPSON said: "Some of our boys are going to play a grand joke on ABE AND ANDY," which he explained was to kill him, remarking that the killing of GRANT was not murder. He stated that he had commissions for this work from the rebel authorities, and spoke of conferring one on BOOTH. These commissions were in blank, with SEDDON'S signature at the end. It was such a commission which DOCTOR YOUNG, the St. Albans raider, received, the blank being filled by MR. CLAY. In a subsequent conversation THOMPSON told CONOVER that BOOTH had been commissioned, and every man engaging in the plot would be. On the day of the assassination, or the day before, CONOVER was conversing with CLEARY about the hanging in the States over the surrender of LEE and the capture of Richmond. CLEARY said they would save the lives of the other side of the mountain the day or two. The assassination was spoken of among them as commonly as the weather.

There was a proposition before the rebel agents in Canada to destroy the Croton Dam, by which New York City is supplied with water. These agents also had eight hundred men, with arms for them, concealed in Chicago for the purpose of releasing the rebel prisoners there.

DR. BLACKBURN, according to CONOVER'S testimony, was recognized in Canada as a rebel agent. CONOVER had heard THOMPSON and CLEARY say that they favored his scheme for introducing yellow fever into New York and other large cities. About the time when it was proposed to set off the dam, Dr. BLACKBURN proposed to poison the reservoirs and calculated the amount of poison necessary. THOMPSON, however, thought it impossible to collect so large a quantity of poison without suspicion.

JAMES B. MERRITT, a physician in Canada, corroborated both CONOVER'S testimony. He had heard SANDERS and others say that LINCOLN would not live out his second term. SANDERS named a number of persons who would be willing to escape—President, Vice-President, and Cabinet, and some of the leading United States Generals. He heard SANDERS and JACOB THOMPSON and CLEARY say that fitting him in making any possible arrangement for the accomplishment of that end. MERRITT also bore witness to BOOTH'S intimacy with SANDERS.

RICHARD MONTGOMERY testified that he had heard PAYNE say that he had friends of the Confederacy all over the Northern States, and that he could at any time have LINCOLN and his advisers put out of the way. He had seen PAYNE a number of times in Canada. Once he had seen him talking with CLEMENT C. CLAY. A few days after the assassination TUCKER said to MONTGOMERY that MR. LINCOLN ought to have died long ago, and that it was a pity the boys had not been allowed to do it when they wanted to. CLEARY also talked with him on the subject, and said it was too bad that the whole work had not been done.

From some testimony offered on Friday it appears that PAYNE previously passed by the name of POWELL. His father's name is GEORGE POWELL, and resides in Florida. That he is a brutal man is evident from the testimony of MARGARET LANAHAN, who says that MR. POWELL frequently outraged a negro girl for disobeying his orders, throwing her on the floor, stamping her, and attempting to kill her. The last time of the girl's insanity brought forward in PAYNE'S behalf DR. CHARLES NICHOLS testified that the exclamation, "I'm mad, I'm mad," uttered by the girl in question, would give ground in his mind to a suspicion that the man was feigning insanity.

LIEUTENANT June 8 by Lieutenant P. NORTON, a lawyer from Troy, New York, was sworn for the prosecution. He was at the National Hotel from about the 15th to about the 20th of March. While there he saw ATZEROTT and O'LOUGHLIN in company with BOOTH. From what he knew of the crime of LINCOLN'S inauguration. He overheard a conversation between BOOTH and ATZEROTT, the substance of which was that, if the latter succeeded as well with JOHNSON as it did with BECHARAM, they would get terribly sold. There was also something said in the effect that BOOTH was not responsible for some of that character that little could be proven by them. On the 3d of March DR. MUDD entered NORTON'S room hastily, appearing to be greatly excited. He said he had made a mistake, that he wanted to see BOOTH.

In regard to the testimony implicating DAVIS and the rebel agents in Canada in the assassination, it is very plain that, being so circumstantial, it can easily be proved to be false. Until rebutting testimony is offered, it must stand as true.

REUNION.

[From the London Spectator.]

AS end as last! The echoes of the war—
The weary sorrow of the years that wore—
Die in the distance. Freedom's rising star
Beacons above a hundred thousand graves:

The graves of heroes who have won the fight.
Who in the morning of the nation's love
Have rung the marriage peal of might and right,
And sealed their troth with their own dragon down.

Peaks of armies shrill across the sea,
Till Europe answers—"Let the struggle cease,
The bloody page is turned; the next may be
For way of pleasantness and ways of peace!"—

A golden morn—a dawn of better things—
The olive-branch—clasping of hands again—
A noble land to conquer—noble kings—
A sky that tempests had not scoured in vain.

This from America we hoped and hear.
Who reads that "in the spirit of its creed"?
Does the hope last when all our eyes are dim,
As History records her darkest deed?

The pilot of his people through the strife,
With his commanding intellect sees to praise,
Even at the close of battle rift of life,
And fair inheritance of length of days.

Defeat and triumph found him calm and just.
He showed how clemency should temper power,
And dying left to future times in trust
The moral victory of his glorious hour.

Overmastered by the irony of fate,
The last and greatest martyr of his cause;
Alas, like Abel's, the first innocent!
He saw the end, and fixed "the purer laws."

May these endure and, as his work, attest
The glory of his honest heart and head.
The simplest, and the bravest, and the best—
The MOSES and the CROMWELL of his land.

Too late the pioneers of modern spite,
A love-clothed mantle o'er his corpse shall glove,
See his name lustrous in Death's sable night,
And offer lowly tribute to his love.

But we who have been with him all the while,
Who knew his words, and loved him long ago,
Rejoice that in the circuit of our isle
There is so room at last for LINCOLN'S foe.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

THE END OF LAVONIER.—The great French chemist Lavoisier did not escape from the terrors of the French Revolution. Being a member of the Academy, one of the most illustrious were the first to suffer. Cast into prison with the most abhorred and degraded criminals, the Lyons due Arts sent a deputation of their number to him to assure him of the interest taken by them in the safety and preservation of a life so valuable to mankind, and to place upon his shoulders the badge of respect entertained toward the man who had rendered so many services to his country. The deputation was received by the judge, a man of eminent merit and of high connections, was a farmer of taxes—a class of men who were the most cordially regarded with extraordinary fury. Perceiving that his life was in danger, he sought refuge in the house of a friend, but M. LEGAL, who had once been the doorkeeper at the Academie des Sciences, refused him admittance, and as a councilor had been consigned to the revolutionary dungeon, by the ungrateful nation to which he owed all. His danger to which he exposed his benefactors, and he voluntarily surrendered himself to the police. The next day Lavoisier continued those scientific labors which had gained him a great name, although he was in prison, hoping he would be brought to trial in a few days. To be tried was to be acquitted. A commission was appointed to sit on a short delay, in order that he might complete a few experiments and bring them before the Academy. But at the reply of the executive Fouquier Tinville, the public accuser, was brief and decisive: "The republic has no need of chemists nor of chemistry; the course of justice shall not be suspended." A few days later this great man was executed by the guillotine. Lavoisier was a man of great genius and benevolence. Only the year before the commencement of the Revolution, the town of Blois being threatened by a famine, he had placed a sum of fifty thousand francs at the disposal of the town without fixing any time for repayment. He was remarkable for his kindness to youthful genius, and took delight in assembling young students in his laboratory, many of whom subsequently became society less famous than himself.

CLEANLINESS AND CHEERFULNESS.—Be cheerful as you can. Be cheerful as you can. Be cheerful as you can.

"If I could but see you well married!" sighed the Countess.

Lord Castletowns shrugged his shoulders.

"And occupying that position in the country to which your birth and talents entitle you. I was talking about you the other day to the Duke of Dorchester. He seems to think there must be a change in the ministry before long; and then, if he, and one or two others of our acquaintance, get into office—mon verron!"

"There are always so many ifs," said Lord Castletowns, with a smile.

"Pooh, Miss Hatherton—the rich Miss Hatherton—is staying at Aylsham Park. Of course, if we give a fête, the Walkinghaws will bring her with them. It is said, Gervase, that she has a hundred and fifty thousand pounds."

"Indeed!" said Lord Castletowns, indifferently.

"And she is handsome."

"Yes—she is handsome."

The Countess looked at her son. The Earl looked out of the window.

"I fancy," said the Countess, "that Major Vaughan is paying a good deal of attention to Olimpia."

"—to Miss Colonna?" said the Earl, with an involuntary catching of his breath. "Impossible!"

"Why impossible?"

"Because— Well, perhaps I scarcely know why; but it seems so unlikely."

"Why unlikely?" pursued the Countess coldly and steadily.

"Well, Vaughan is not a marrying man—and he has no private means, or next to none, besides his pay—and—and then, they are so utterly unsuited—unsuited in every way—in tastes, ages, disposition, every thing!"

The young man spoke hastily, and with a perceptibly-heightened color. His mother, still coldly clear-eyed, him, went on.

"I do not agree with you, Gervase," said she, "in any one of your objections. I believe that Major Vaughan would quite willingly marry Miss Olimpia were the lady. He is not more than forty; and if he has only a few hundreds a year besides his pay, he is, at all events, richer than Olimpia's father. Besides, he is a gallant officer; and if all that Colonna anticipates should come to pass, a gallant officer would be worth more than a mere fortune, just now, to the Italian cause."

The Earl still stood by the window, looking out at the park and the blue hills far away, but made no answer.

"He has said nothing to you upon the subject?" said Lady Castletowns.

"Nothing!"

"Perhaps, however, it is hardly likely that he would do so."

"Most unlikely, I should say. But here's the letter-bag—and here come surgeon and patient."

Lady Castletowns became at once confident and sympathetic; Mademoiselle Colonna laughed off the accident with impatient indifference; Major Vaughan bowed over his hostess's fair hand; and all took their places at table.

"A budget, as usual, for Colonna," said Lord Castletowns, sorting the pile of letters and newspapers which had been laid before him. "One, two, three billets, redolent of what might be called the parfum du boudoir, for Vaughan—also, as usual. Two letters, my dearest mother, for you; and only one (a square-shouldered, round-fisted, blue-complexioned, obstinate-looking business document) for myself. A pretty thing to lie at the bottom of one's letter-bag, like Hope at the bottom of Pandora's casket!"

"It hath a Bond Street aspect, Castletowns, that effects me rather unpleasantly," said Major Vaughan, into whose brow the angry flush with which he had received his three letters and swept them carelessly on one side had not yet quite faded.

"Say rather a Chancery Lane aspect," replied the young lord, breaking the seal as he spoke—"and that's as much worse than Bond Street as Newgate is worse than the Queen's Bench."

"Bond Street and Chancery Lane, Newgate and the Queen's Bench!" repeated Mademoiselle Colonna. "The conversation sounds very awful! What does it all mean?"

"I presume," said Lady Castletowns, "that Major Vaughan supposes the letter to be written by a—a lawyer, or some person of that description; while it really comes from my son's lawyer, Mr. Trefalden."

"I met Mr. Trefalden a few weeks ago," said Mademoiselle Colonna, "in Switzerland."

"In Switzerland?" echoed Lord Castletowns.

"And he authorized me to add his name to our general committee list."

"A miracle! a miracle!"

"And why a miracle?" asked Lady Castletowns. "Does Mr. Trefalden disapprove the Italian cause?"

Mr. Trefalden, my dear mother, never approves or disapproves of any public movement whatever. Nature seems to have created him without opinions."

"Then he is either a very superficial or a very ambitious man," said Lady Castletowns.

"The latter, depend on it. He's a remarkably clever fellow, and has good interest, no doubt. He will set his politics to the tune of his interest some day, and make his way to the woolsack 'like a gallard.'"

"I am glad this is but a conjectural estimate of Mr. Trefalden's character," said Olimpia.

"You like him, then?" said Major Vaughan, hastily.

"I neither like him nor dislike him; but if these were proven facts, I could never speak to him again."

Signor Colonna came in and made his morning salutations, his eyes wandering eagerly toward his letters all the time.

"Good-morning—good-morning. Late, did you say? Peccavi! So I am. I lost myself in the library. Hell! I heard no bell. Pray forgive me, dear Lady Castletowns. Any news to-day? You were early this morning, Major Vaughan. Saw you in the saddle soon after six. Plenty of letters this morning, I see—plenty of letters!"

And with his letters slipped into his seat, and became at once immersed in the contents of the documents before him.

"Trefalden writes from Lowa, mother," said Lord Castletowns. "He excuses his delay on the plea of much business. He has been settling his cousin's affairs—the said cousin having come in for between four and five millions sterling."

"A man who comes in for four or five millions sterling has no right to live," said Major Vaughan. "His very being is an insult to the offended species."

"But if the cousin should prove to be a lady?" suggested Mademoiselle Colonna.

"I would condemn her, of course—to matrimony."

"I should think Trefalden would take care of that!" laughed the Earl.

"But is the cousin a lady?" asked Lady Castletowns, with seeming indifference.

"Alas! no, my dear mother, too surely he belongeth to the genus unmentionable. Listen, Maurice—I have been assisting my cousin in the arrangement of his affairs, he having lately inherited a fortune of between four and five millions sterling."

"I have no doubt that he is fat, ugly, and disagreeable," said Major Vaughan.

"And plebeian," added Lady Castletowns, with a smile.

"And illiberal," said Olimpia.

"And, in short, so rich," said the Earl, "that were he hideous and ignorant as Caliban, socially repulsive as Polyphemus, and as devoid of beauty of the season would gladly wear orange-blossoms for him at St. George's! What says his honorable counsel?—shall I offer him dear to Castletowns for a week or two, and shall we all fall to worshiping the golden calf?"

"I am afraid," said Mademoiselle Olimpia, scornfully; but she was the only one who replied.

The breakfast party then broke up. The Earl went to his stables, Olimpia to her apartments, and Major Vaughan to the billiard-room. Signor Colonna and Lady Castletowns strolled to and fro in the sunshine, outside the breakfast-room windows.

"But who is this millionaire?" asked the Italian, eagerly.

"Caro amico, you know as much as I know," replied Lady Castletowns. "He is a cousin of our solicitor, Mr. Trefalden, who is a very well-off, gentlemanly person in his way, I suppose, I think I have heard that it has been accumulating for one or two centuries—but that is probably a mere rumor."

"Between four and five millions!" ejaculated Colonna. "With such a fortune, what might he be a friend to for the Italian cause!"

Lady Castletowns smiled.

"Sempre Italia!" she said.

"Sempre Italia!" repeated he, lifting his hat reverently as he pronounced the words. "While I live, Lady Castletowns. While I live."

They had come to the end of the path, and were about to return when he laid his hand on hers, and said, very earnestly:

"You think with this man, I wish I knew him. I have won over thousands of recruits in my time, Alethea—thousands who had only their blood to give, and who gave it; but I have never had so much in a cause like ours. If we had had but one million eighteen months ago Italy would now have been free."

"Ah, you want me to help you—you want Gervase to bring him here? Is that so?"

"Precisely."

"Well, I suppose it can be done—somehow," said, "I think it can," replied Colonna. "I am sure it can."

"And it might lead to great results, eh?"

"It might, indeed, to that," he replied. "I have thought of that; and Olimpia would never marry any man who did not devote himself to Italy body and soul."

"And purse," added Lady Castletowns, quietly.

"And purse, of course," said he, with a somewhat heightened color.

"Then I will ask that I can, dear old friend, for your sake," said Lady Castletowns, affectionately.

"And I," he replied, "will do what I can for the sake of the cause. God knows, Alethea, that I do it for the cause alone—God knows how pure my motives are in that respect."

"I am sure of it," she replied, abstractedly.

"Had I but the half of four or five millions at command, the stake upon which I have set my whole life and my child's life would be won. Do you hear me, Alethea?—would be, must be won!"

"And shall be won, amico, if any help of mine can avail you," said Lady Castletowns. "I will speak to Gervase about it at once. He shall ask both the cousins down."

"Best friend," murmured the Italian, taking the hand which she extended to him, and pressing it gratefully in both his own.

"But beware!—not a word to him of all this. He has his English notions of hospitality—you understand?"

"Yes—it is true."

"Adieu, then, till luncheon."

"Addio."

And the Countess, with a look of unusual preoccupation on her fair brow, went slowly back to the house, thinking of many things, chiefly of how her son should some day marry an heiress, and how Olimpia Colonna should be disposed of to Saxon Trefalden.

CHAPTER XV.

SAXON DRAWS HIS FIRST CHECK.

A TALL young man stood at the first-floor window of a handsome house in Piccadilly, dreaming upon the plate-glass panes, and staring listlessly down upon the crowded street below. It was about two o'clock in the day, and the brilliant thoroughfare was all alive with color and sunshine; but his face took no joyousness from the busy scene. It were, on the contrary, as gloomy and discontented an expression as such a bright young face could well put on. The ceaseless ebb and flow of gorgeous equipages; the fair pedestrians in their fashionable toilets; even the little band of household troops riding by in their scarlet coats, failed apparently to interest that weary spectator. He yawned, looked at his watch, took an impatient turn or two about the room, seated himself at the window, and drummed again upon the panes. Some books, an opera-glass, and one or two newspapers lay on the floor; the leaves of the books were uncut, and only one of the newspapers had been unfolded. Too ennuyé to read, and too restless to sit still, this young man evidently found his time hang heavily upon his hands.

Presently a cab drove up to the hotel, and two gentlemen alighted from it. The first of these was William Trefalden; the second, Lord Castletowns. William Trefalden looked up and nodded as he entered the broad stone step, and the watcher at the window ran joyously to meet him on the stairs.

"I'm so glad you've come!" was his eager exclamation. "I've been watching for you, and the time has seemed so long!"

"I'm sorry to have caused you pain," replied Mr. Trefalden, smiling.

"But it is dreary here!"

"And I bring you a visitor," continued the other. "Lord Castletowns, allow me to present my cousin, Saxon Trefalden. Saxon, Lord Castletowns is so kind as to desire your acquaintance."

Saxon cast out his hand, and gave the Earl a hearty shake. He would as soon have thought of greeting his guest with a bow as of flinging his over the balcony into the street below.

"Thank you," said he. "I'm very much obliged to you."

"I am surprised that you find this situation dreary, Mr. Trefalden," said Lord Castletowns, with a glance toward the window.

"I find all London dreary," replied Saxon, bluntly.

"May I ask how long you have been here?"

"Five days."

"Then you have really had no time to form an opinion."

"I have had time to be very miserable," said Saxon. "I never was so miserable in my life. The noise and hurry of London bewilder me. I can not think—I can not think of anything—I can do nothing. I find it impossible to read; and if I go out alone in the streets I lose myself. I have been so used to be at home. I have had smoke and dust, but I have not breathed since I came into the place."

"The first impressions of our Babel are certainly not colleur de rose," said the Earl, laughingly.

"They are couleur de lothbury and couleur de Chancery Lane," interposed William Trefalden. "My cousin, Lord Castletowns, has for these last four years been a victim of the law. We have been putting him in possession of his property, and he has seen nothing of town save the gold regions west of Temple Bar."

"An excellent beginning," said the Earl. "The Arabs take into Belgravia is through Threadneedle Street."

"And the noblest prospect in London is the Bank of England," added the lawyer.

"I thought it very ugly and dirty," said Saxon, innocently.

"Upon the law business is all over now," said Lord Castletowns.

"Yes, for the present; and Saxon has nothing to do but to amuse himself."

"Amuse myself!" echoed Saxon. "I must go home to do that."

"Because Redenhau is so gay, or because you find London so uninviting?" asked the Earl, with a smile.

"Because I am a born mountaineer, and because to me this place is a prison. I must have air to breathe, hills to climb, and a gun on my shoulder. That is what I call amusement."

"That is what I call amusement also," said Lord Castletowns; "and if you will come down to Sherry Lynn, I will show you a fine shooting-rod and a hunter included. But in the mean while, you must ask us pere to you that London is not so barren of entertainment as you seem to think."

"Let this help to prove it," said Mr. Trefalden, taking from his pocket a little oblong book in a green paper cover. "There's magic in these pages, my dear fellow. They contain all the wit, wisdom, and beauty of the world we live in. While you have this in your pocket you will never want for amusement—your friends and when you have come to the end of the present volume the publishers will furnish you with another."

"What is it?" said Saxon, turning it over somewhat doubtfully.

"A check-book."

"Pshaw! money again. Always money!"

"Don't speak of it disrespectfully. You have more than you can count, and as yet you neither know what it is worth nor what to do with it."

"Pray enlighten me, then," said Saxon, with a touch of impatience in his voice. "Tell me, in the first place, what it is worth?"

"That is a matter of individual opinion," replied Mr. Trefalden, with one of his quiet smiles. "If you ask Lord Castletowns, he will probably tell you that it is worth less than noble blood, bright eyes, and an Italian liberty. If you ask a plodding fellow like myself, he will probably value it above all three."

"Well then, in the second place, what am I to do with it?"

"Spend it."

Saxon shrugged his shoulders; and Lord Castletowns, who had colored up somewhat angrily the minute before, laughed, and said that it was good advice.

"Spend it," repeated the lawyer. "You never will know how to employ your money till you acquire the art of getting rid of it. You have yet to learn that instead of turning every thing into gold, like Midas, you can turn gold into every thing. It is the true secret of the transmutation of metal."

"Shall I be any the wiser or happier for this knowledge?" asked Saxon, with a shake of the head.

"You can not help being the wiser," laughed his cousin; "nor, I should think, the happier. You will come to know 'my' in the right sense. He who has plenty of money and knows how to spend it is never in want of entertainment."

"Ay, and fashion now! There's the difficulty."

"If you had read Molière," replied Mr. Trefalden, "you would be aware that a rich man has discernment in his grasp."

"Cousin, you are laughing at me."

It was said with perfect good humor, but with such directness that even Mr. Trefalden's practiced self-possession was momentarily troubled.

"But I suppose that a rich fellow can afford to be laughed at," added Saxon, with a sun quite of your opinion. It will help to civilize me, and make you know your mission. And now for a lesson in alchemy. What shall I transmute my gold into first?"

"Nay, into whatever seems to you to be best worth the trouble," replied Mr. Trefalden. "First of all, I should say, into a certain amount of superfine Saxony and other clothes; into a large stock of French kid and French cambric—and a valet. After that—well, after that, suppose you ask Lord Castletowns's opinion."

"I vote for a tall horse, a short tiger, and a cab," said the young Earl.

"And chambers in St. James's Street," suggested the lawyer.

"And a stall at Gye's."

"And all the brasses, pictures, Baskerville editions, Delphin classics, organs, and Etruscan antiquities you take it into your head to desire! That's the way to transform gold into joy, happy fellow! Taken as a philosophical experiment, I know nothing more beautiful, simple, and satisfactory."

"You bewilder me," said poor Saxon. "You speak a language which is partly jest and partly earnest, and I know not where the earnestness ends, or where the jest begins. What is it that you really mean? I am quite willing to do what you endorse a man in my position should do; but you must show me how to set about it."

"I am here to ask for no other purpose."

"And more than this, you must have leave to reject your system, if I dislike, or grow weary of it."

"What! return to roots and wood after Kuhn and Stultz?"

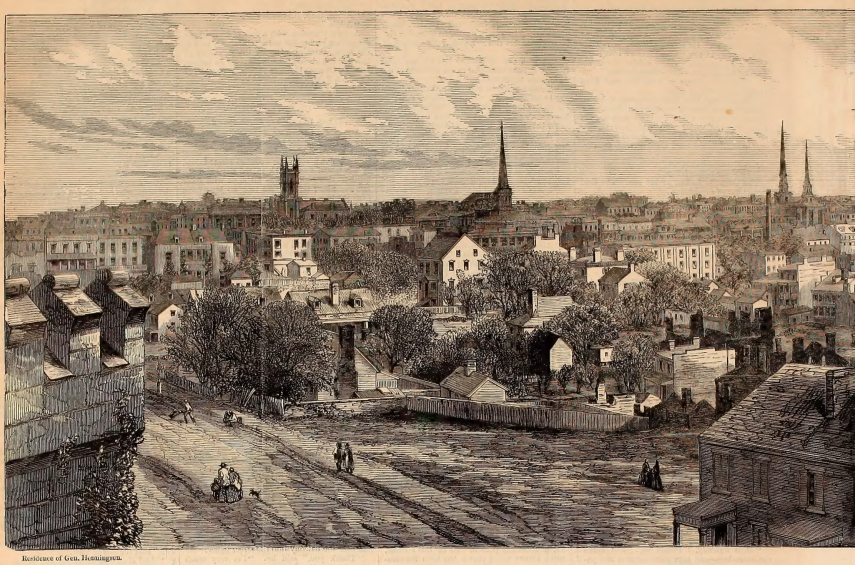
"Certainly, if I find the roots more palatable, and the wood more becoming."

"Agreed. Then we begin at once. You shall put yourself under my tuition, and I—that of Lord Castletowns. You shall obey us implicitly for the next six or eight hours, and you shall begin by writing a check for a hundred, which we can cash at Drummond's as we go along."

"With all my heart," said Saxon; and so, aided by his cousin's instructions, sat down and wrote his first check.

"He's a capital fellow," said Lord Castletowns to Mr. Trefalden, as they drove down the hotel stairs; "a splendid fellow, and I like him thoroughly. Shall I propose him at the Erectheum? He is about to belong to a club, and I know some men there who would be delighted to have it in their power to offer any member of my introduction."

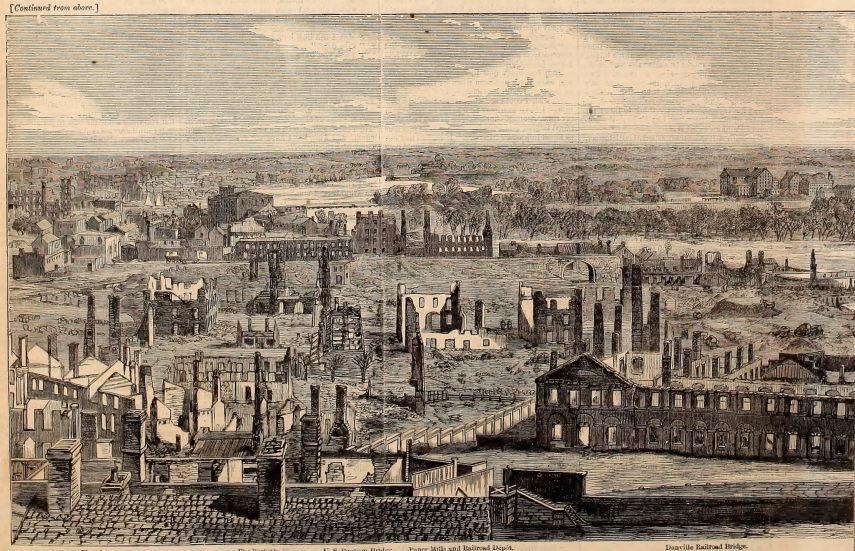
"By all means. It is the very thing for him," replied Mr. Trefalden. "He must have acquaintances, you know; and it is out of the question that a busy man like myself should do the honors of London to him or any one. Were he my own brother I would not undertake it."



"And I am never here myself for many days at a time," said the Earl. "London is an expensive luxury, and I am obliged to make a little of it go a long way. However, while I am here, and whenever I am here, I will give me a great deal of pleasure to show Mr. Saxon Trefalden any attention in my power."

"You are a trump, Castletowns, my dear fellow, Lord Castletowns is so good as to offer to get you into the Erectheum."

"The Erectheum of Athens?" exclaimed Saxon, opening his blue eyes in laughing astonishment.



"Nonsense—of Pall Mall. It is a fashionable club."

"I am much obliged to Lord Castletowns," replied Saxon, vaguely. But he had no more notion of the nature, objects, or aims of a fashionable club than a Bedouin Arab.

IN WEAL OR WOE.

How could you write such cruel words to me?
Oh, friend of all, the most beloved and best,
I hold you to your vows, I am not "free,"
Nor those my heart dethrones its honored guest!

So here's your letter blotted with my tears,
It is not worthy of your ready pen—
And this the answer to your doubts and fears:
You still are sov'reign 'mong all other men.

Your weary years since last beside our tryst
You stood to me, but now the foe,
And softly whispered, while my lips you kissed,
"Faithful to thee through coming weal or woe!"

With broken heart I sent this sight to grey
That God would safely keep you in His hand,
Would be your shield throughout the bloody fray,
And bring you home when victory crowned the land.

He hath been kind, my hero brave and true;
And though you come not so as you left my side
Stalwart and strong, but "crippled," "scarred," I do
Still hold you dearer than all else beside.

For oh, my friend, my well-beloved and best,
There's naught but death can ever part us two;
You did but would aside lest my love should wound
That you might read my loyal heart anew.

And now I wait for you beside our tryst
To speak the word you've waited for so long ago,
When tenderly my tearful face you kissed,
"Faithful to thee through coming weal or woe!"

And I this night will lowly bend to pray,
"I thank Thee, Father, then Thy watchful hand
Hath kept my friend from harm in battle's fearful fray,
And given him back now victry's crowned the land."

PRUE SAYBROOK'S STORY.

I HAD on my pink painted muslin the first day I ever saw him, and roses to match it in my hair, for I was just seventeen, and had left a tea company for my birthday. He came to it along with the Southerners. I always liked pink best, and sister Mercy blue; blue was the gentlefolk, but I cared most for looking well. And her tucker hid her sharp bones, and many a sound scolding I got for wearing mine too low. Well, as the new officer came in, I, of course, knew it. Seventeen. Dear, dear! to think on't, and that was I, with cheeks like roses and hair like gold! the sash I wore half a yard wide, and pink, too. And this is I, too, eighty-five—with white hair and wrinkles (there's a wave! the hair yet, though), and fat and lame to boot! Dear, dear! And the same woman, with the same soul after all!

Eh, talk of wonders, you'll find no greater than that!

Mercy was the cleverest, and had good sense and steady ways, but I had most beauty. Mother was a Sharpe, and I have my looks from her; and the Saybrooks, father's folk, were plain but bright. Mercy was father's own child all over. Not a bit of a flirt, and engaged before she was sixteen to a man Dill, and only waiting until he could stock his farm he marry. But, dear me, I'd flirted with every lad in the place, I'm afraid before she was sixteen to a man cared I for any one, and all liked me. So, one day I'd be cool and the next warm, and laugh to see them happy or miserable as they chose. I didn't know, you see, what it was to have the heartache. There wasn't heaviness enough in mine to breed a sigh or a tear. I'd been petted and loved my life through. I'd left off flirting after I knew Eugene. Flirt with him! I couldn't, or wouldn't, and the others didn't seem worth it. Yet there were those of them mother wouldn't have called a better match for me. You see he was the poor and unfriended boy. Everybody, and we were prejudiced against them as immoral, and then, at home, we had the Rev. Ebenezer Brown's friends in France, and had seen how they went to the play-house on the Sabbath, and drank wine in gardens, and had shops open and cafés; and that they were in every way to be ashamed and feared, being-for the most part Roman Catholics; and though my grandfather would have been kind to a heathen and sacrificed to Thug, he couldn't have shaken hands with another Christian who did not believe as he did, and said "a Romanist" as you might say "a fiend."

But Eugene was not a Catholic, and after the first horror at the idea of a Frenchman mother found no great fault with him. So in time, from stopping at the porch to speak and bow, he came to taking tea with us, and quite won her, he was so polite and gallant. Then, by-and-by, went to church with us and listened to the sermon, and father liked him for that; and by and by grandfather called him a fine lad, and Mercy left off sitting bolt upright in great distance and putting on prim airs while he was present.

As for me—there, there, there, I thought my heart had done beating fast, and that I was too old to feel warm and glad as I used; but a woman never grows old, she only looks so. Eh, but I felt as though I were in the parsonage again, and none in the room but mother, and he asking me, and Eugene was stealing closer to me, and in the twilight putting his arm about my waist and telling me the story that had made the one I loved best love me! And I couldn't look at him nor speak, but somehow my head was on his breast and my hand in his, and he kissed my fingers, and fondled them as mothers do those of their babies. And they were white and pink-tipped then, not wrinkled and laced with blue veins like now.

Heigh-ho! what a sweet time it was. We told Mercy, and no one guessed it. Not father, that was natural; he was to be told of such things, though courting goes on under their very eyes, unless it comes to kissing. Not my mother; not even Mercy. She was thinking of her own true love, and I was but a child, she thought. Older than she was when Aaron first courted her; but she was twenty by that time and so steady, and I but seventeen. Well, in the evening grandfather would nod in his chair, and mother be away in the keeping-room with black Hannah, busy about preserves or the ironing of father's shirt-ruffles, or what not, and father reading his sermon for next Sabbath in his study, and Mercy and Aaron hand in hand out in the garden—and who watched Eugene and me but the moon? And I didn't care if she did see his arm about my waist and my cheek on his shoulder as we sat by the lattice window with the sweetbrier peeping in and the chirp of the crickets making the evening seem all the stiller. Then when we parted I'd watch him from the porch, and think how different his light tread was from the heavy stamp of the farmers round, as his bow was from the nods and ducks they gave you, and his white shapely hand from their broad red paws. He was a gentleman. There was French blood in his veins. I don't know what it was that ruined him. A good many Frenchmen came over at that time who were poor, and who had seen better days it wasn't as it is now, when papers bring every day's news to your door. We lumped it all under the head of "troubles in France," and Eugene would call it "troubles in France" had ruined Eugene's family, and his mother died there—over with, to-day, and he had given lessons in French and music, and so supported her until she died. I've seen her grave in the church-yard, and have seen him weep over it like a child; for he had a tender heart, my poor Eugene, and loved her dearly. Since her death he had gone on teaching, Myrtle's boys learned the violin of him. And Miss Casey, who had the only piano in the place, was his pupil, and one or two others took lessons of him. But he kept himself out of want and debt; but as for marrying, I knew and he knew that could not be. I did not care. I was young and he was poor. But he did. So he told me one day that though it broke his heart to think of it he must leave me to win a fortune. He could not ask me to share his poverty. A music-teacher, earning only a few shillings a week, he said, while the girl he loved and himself grew old together. I was not to make any great cries.

And he must have at least a little cage for his bird, a little garden for his rose.

Oh, how my heart smote my bodice while he spoke! But he was right—I knew it. There was nothing to be done where we were but to go on in the beaten track, and what was Mercy's children to come into the world, and I was Aunt Prue; pretty still, they said, but pale; for the fever had blanch'd all my colour, and I put my hair in bands, and mother found no fault with tuckers—they were high enough now.

So, one morning, I woke up to find myself eighteen-and-twenty, and that day Mercy brought her girls and boys home, and we had a feast. It was ten years from our landing in New York, and she and I went up to the little room we had shared, and sat down to look back through there were things I didn't care to talk of—and one was the vcoer I had—a Doctor Hope; but I trusted she did not know of him.

"Prudence," said she, "you're eight-and-twenty."

"Ay!" said I; "I'm as old maid, Mercy."

"I'm twelve years a wife."

"No?" said I. "You think not?"

"You know it," said she. "Are you at your flirting pranks now, Prue?"

"Am I playing with my dolls?" asked I. "I left both behind me years ago."

"Then what are you, child, Prue?" said Mercy. "I'd like to know what you mean."

She put her elbows on the table between us and leaned her cheeks on her hands. It was a way she had when she was interested in her talk.

"I mean Doctor Hope," said she.

"Who has been chattering of Doctor Hope?" says I.

"Himself," says she.

I'd taken a notion to pains to keep any one from knowing how Doctor Hope had tried to make me like him, and how he liked me, that I was provoked.

"Has he sent you wooing?" said I.

"Yes," said she, "he has."

I thought to myself that we might have told him, Mercy, that my heart was given away long ago," said I, "and that I've never won it back. Oh, Mercy, don't think I've forgotten because I'm old!"

Mercy started up and came to me, and put both hands on my shoulders.

"Prudence Saybrook," said she, "can it be you have no more pride than to keep on thinking of a man who's dead? Is it you? Are you so wicked as to break a good man's heart for love of a dad one? Oh, you're doing wrong! I blush for you."

Said I, that Doctor Hope's heart's in no brittle, and a single woman is as good as a married one.

"Oh, Prue, Prue!" said Mercy. "Haven't you a heart? He loves you so dearly. He told me so last night; and you might do him good, and care for his patients, and keep his home; and you refuse for love of one who calls some other woman wife, no doubt."

At that I fell a crying, and then she comforted me; but for all that she never lost her ground. She kept at me about it. So, at last I said:

"Mercy, we'll have it to mother. If she says, 'Marry him,' I will." I thought mother would not be willing to part with me, you see, and think I should have peace. But mother said, "Marry him, Prue. He's a good man; and spinsters are not happy." And so I had given my word, and kept it.

Old grandfather married us in the stone church, with its narrow windows and the tablets let in between the pulpit; and I wore white, and Dr. Hope's house his wife. I was very calm. I had not thought to be so; and he was loving and tender. A good, quiet man, and I made the life we led was peaceful: never an angry word—never a wrangle. I had promised to honor and obey, and I kept the vow; and he to cherish and protect, and I saw cherished if ever wife was. And yet his dead wife's portrait was on the wall, and her children at his knee; and Eugene's name was carved on my heart, and I saw his face in my day-dreams, and dressed me often at night, though I had put the lock of hair and the old letters all away, for I knew a wife's duty.

But there came a joy to me at last, and a babe lay on my breast—and then I looked up into its father's eyes and knew that something had been born with the child—a pure, true love for him—not the blushing girl-love, but the wifely love of middle age; for before it came we had been wed so long that I was five-and-thirty. We had left our sweet country place long before, and were living at a manufacturing town where nothing but black chimneys could be seen, and the clatter of machinery, and the tramp of the workmen going home to dinner or coming from it, was like the tread of armies. The gentlefolk were mostly rich manufacturers, who owned the mills, and lived in black - looking brick houses, fine enough, but without the air or grass or bush about them. I'd tried and tried to make a garden about mine, but the soil was against me—nothing grew. I was weary of it; but the Doctor said, "Be patient, darling, we'll make our fortune and go back to live among green fields by-and-by."

He had plenty of practice there. I think there always is more need of a physician in such places.

We were well thought of too. His first wife's girls grew up tall and handsome, and it would have been wrong of me not to let them have a chance to marry if they liked. We were a good deal of company; and in those days you didn't have your guests shown into a cold parlor, and in half an hour go down and glower at them across the room, and let them go without bite or sup. If twas but a minute they staid you offered wine and cake, and generally company came for a day, or if it was for a dance in the evening, you were sure some would stay all night. I was busy and happy; for my husband never allowed, and said his lass was fairer than the youngest of them all, and my boy was good and handsome. Only I pined a little for the country home, and to be nearer to Mercy and to mother, who was growing very old.

Well, in time the girls were courted, and, odd enough, the two brothers, Lennox and Cecil Blome, the sons of the richest factor in the place. Steady, church-going men, with sharp eyes for business, and all that. I'd not thought they had half Eugene's features. As matches go they were love-matches, and so I say should we say "no."

They were married. Each had her brick house full of fine furniture, and silks to wear, and settled down as manufacturers' wives. And then I began to crave the Doctor to go home again. I'd not realized to me there'd have been a different end to the story, he said, "Wait two years, then I'll go." So I waited.

Oh, the sickly time! First one thing and then another broke out among the factory people. Funerals made the road to the church-yard black on Sabbath afternoons.

The disease crept into the fine brick houses; and now a child, and now a mother, and now some strong man laid low. I trembled for the Doctor, but he had no fear himself. At last there came a terrible story of small-pox. And then it wasn't as it is now, when every child is vaccinated. There was no stop to it. We'd passed over faces as the plow passes over the ground.

My husband wanted me to leave him, but I sent our boy to his grandmother's and staid with him. Eh, none can say that I didn't do my duty! And praying God to spare us both, I went with him and helped him to nurse the other doctor's little place. There was only one who aided us. That was a poor cripple who had been in the Blume factory a book-keeper, and when he came to the place I never saw a being so bent as he was, so crushed and maimed and yet able to walk about. His hair was white, and all his face like that of a very old man. Yet he was not so very old they said. At first I doubted what it was for; but when I heard him speak that changed me, for he was a Frenchman, and ever since I had loved Eugene the accent of that tongue had seemed dear to my ear, and start and look, thinking he had come at last.

There could be no such fancy about that poor cripple. He was a hideous old man, and thin. Yet when I heard him talk out of my sight I have decided it was like Eugene's with the music gone. So I was kind to that poor soul. The factory people loved him. They called him Monsieur. I believe not one knew his name. I called him Monsieur also. Many had died, and he made over a spare cabin with loathsome, dying creatures about us. Once, when the very sexton fled with fear, and the Doctor's own people refused to go, Monsieur we buried a mother's babe for her, and he carved a name on a wooden cross to mark the place. Through illness like that the old plague-spot became sacred, comforting and aiding each other, the Doctor, that poor deformed, and I. Half the factories were closed. Half the people were gone. Those who had lived in upper rooms of their great houses and held communication with no one. Those who had been mothers and fathers among the poor turned the new victims at last, and we had some rest. By-and-by, when the bitter winter was over and spring came, the fever departed. My boy had died who died was buried, and others at their work again. Mercy was dead. It was a glad thing to know that they prayed for us in the church, that they thought so well of us, these poor factory hands. Yet we had only remembered they were our fellow-creatures.

Eh, but the time comes back again! The Doctor and I, arm in arm, and the poor cripple among us his staff at the church gate, and women and children crowding about to say God bless you, and I with my boy at my knee. It was just before we left bent from the church-yard over the path, and under it we parted. I said, "At revoir, Monsieur!" But he caught my hand and put it to his lips. "May the bon Dieu guar' Madame from all sorrow!" he said, and I felt with the kiss a tear fall on my fingers. Eh, but we liked creatures here when the Lord chooses to darken our eyes!

That night I slept happy and peaceful on my husband's bosom. In the morning I wakened with a start to find him shivering and burning by turns. I knew what it was—the cholera; we had come to him. Soon he did not know me. I weary work listening to such a tale. No need to tell you more of it than I have told.

I tried to think of Heaven's justice, but I couldn't then. All seemed wrong, as if— No matter; I've repented long ago for thoughts I thought then, and maybe God has forgiven me. One bright June day I saw them pile the sod over his bosom—the broad, gentle bosom that had cherished me so long. Ah me! it was a woeful day, with all its bright sun and green fields—a blacker day than ever came in winter.

I went home to my lonely house in my widow's weeds, and I was night sad moaning and rocking myself to and fro at a window, where I could see the grave-yard, with its white stones, like ghosts in the moonlight. At dawn came a rap at the door, and in walked my step-daughter's husband, Lennox Blume.

"Mother," said he—he always called me that—"it's no time to trouble you, I know; but I've been sent by a dying man. Will you come to the factory—the carriage is at the door?"

"Is it small-pox?" said I.

"No," said he, "or I'd not have come for you. A hasty consumption, they say. It's poor old Monsieur. He has never lifted his head since you saw him the last Sabbath in the church porch. The toil was too much for him. You were heroes all three, and two are martyrs."

I put on my bonnet and black veil, and went down stairs. The factory was not far. In a little room behind the office the old Frenchman had lived for years. He lay there now, dying. A factory woman came out as we entered.

"Hist!" she said. "Wait here a bit. He's asleep. When he wakes he'll have his mind for the last; 'twon't be for long. I'll call ye."

So we sat down in the office.

"He's very old," said I, to say something.

"No," said Lennox, "not sixty."

"He looks eighty."

"Yes."

"But such a life is best ended," said I.

"A sad life," said Lennox. "Have you heard his story, mother?"

"No."

"We have reason to be fond of him and kind to him," said Lennox. "You should have heard my mother talk of him. He saved her life. It was years ago, and she was a pretty young woman, and father had just built this factory. There had been trouble in finding hands, and many of them were French. Her mother could not talk to them, and he went to New York to find some one who could. He found a Frenchman, young and handsome, and anxious for a position which would enable him to marry; for he was betrothed to some girl in the country, and was waiting, as many a one has waited, for full pockets. Are you ill, mother?"

"No," said I, "go on." But the story brought my old life back so strangely.

"Father brought him over," said Lennox; "and he was pleased and anxious to please. It was necessary that he should be on the spot at once. And they made a bed for him in the little office where he now lies dying. That evening he spent writing to his betrothed, and in the morning chose the spot where he would build his home. The hands came on that day, and the first clang of machinery was heard. Mother was excited by it. 'I must see them,' she said; and leaving every thing at home went up into the factory. She did not even wait for a bonnet, but threw a silk shawl over her head. She never thought of danger; and while father's back was turned went close to the machinery. And somehow her silk shawl she wore was caught and she dragged backward. It would have been to her death but for the young Frenchman. In a moment he had rushed near and torn the shawl in two by main strength; but doing that he tangled it about his own arm and so took her place.

"It was only for a moment—just an instant before the machinery stopped. But he went in a handsome, strong young man, and came out a mass of broken bones and crushed flesh."

"Yet he lived, and you have seen him."

"Yes. Nothing he said to father when he knew the truth was this:

"'I was to have been married soon. That can never be now. Take me what I am. Perhaps I shall die soon, perhaps I shall live a long while. When I am gone send this letter to her. It will tell her all. But let her then hide even my name, she should learn the truth; she will think me dead or false and be happy with another.'

"That is the letter into a secret drawer of his desk; and father promised. If the girl lives she is an old woman now."

"An old, old woman," said I. "An old woman; what was her name?"

I think I was grasping wildly in the air like one stricken with fever, for I remember Lennox catching me in his arms with a frightened cry for help. Then all was dark; and I came out of it to hear the woman say,

"Monsieur is awake."

I went in to him.

Death was there. Gray and cold lay the face beneath its touch; but the poor deformed body was hidden by the bed-clothes, and I saw Eugene once more. The bloom was not upon the cheek—that brow was wrinkled; but they were the cheek and brow my girl-love had kissed.

A merciful God had blinded me when to know the truth would have been madness.

"Leave us three," I said. I heard the woman say, "She wants to pray with him."

Perhaps Lennox thought so too.

When they were gone I knelt down by him.

The thirty years vanished then—the thirty years of wedded life. "Pray, Prue Saybrook once more,

"'Eugene,' I said, 'Eugene;' and the poor one crept around my neck, and I heard him say, "Prue, my darling, at last!"

And I looked in his eyes and saw them glazing, and felt his hand grow heavier and colder on my neck; and my lips met his—and he was dead!

That night I took the old letter from the secret drawer, and read it. It ran thus:

"CHERI AMIE,—I told you that I would soon write to you. I have good news—listen. I am rich—a fine salary —a home to bring you to live in. It is at ——, with M. Blume, a manufacturer. My heart beats—my hand trembles. They will give you to me, and I shall be happy as the angels who dwell with the bon Dieu. To repose in thy arms—hear thy sweet voice—kiss thy lips—all to heaven! NEXT SUNDAY I will come to you. It is too much bliss—I dare not think.

"EUGENE ——."

"Your dear wife and cousin."

Further down were other lines, in French:

"Never, never, never—all dark, all hopeless—a wretch—a living cripple—a creature by a woman to loathe. She would pity me, but she could not love. Oh, sweet angel, I have written to you in my agony, but I should see thee shrink in horror. Better death than that.

"I wish you to see her once more. You could look —one smile. Can it never be? And yet must I live on? —Oh, it is better for her to think me dead—quite so! Send no patience, sweet Heaven, and let me die soon."

And lower still there was a later date under that I read—still in French, which he had taught me years before:

"I have seen her—with her husband. I have touched her hand—have spoken to her, and she does not know. She is hard to hear. Almost I had said, 'Look at me: this is thy miserable husband.' God kept me from it: but she will know when I am dead."

I put the letter in my bosom, and sat down beside my dead and wept. Yes, I, Prue Haynes Saybrook for her dead lover? I could not tell. But now when I think of Eugene, after thirty years of well-ordered life, I always see my husband with his first wife, and myself with poor Eugene.

A COMBAT IN THE ARCTIC OCEAN.

ALONG the shores of distant Greenland, and among the yawning ice-caverns that resound with the roar of the Arctic tides, the white bear is found in kingly majesty, gazing with quiet curiosity upon any vessel that passes its retreat, and fighting desperately when attacked by venturesome mariners.

The cool impudence of this animal is sometimes evinced in a remarkable manner. I have seen it enter a ship occupied by a crew of seventy-two men, and, after deliberately surveying them for a few moments, match from the hand of one a seal which that man lately captured, and walk off with its prize in the most unconcerned manner that can be imagined.

On another occasion, while a boat's crew belonging to the ship St. George were passing an ice-field a white bear of huge dimensions suddenly made its appearance and attacked the boat. Fortunately, engaging it at once and severely injuring the man amidships, who was with much difficulty rescued by his companions, after they had successfully driven by crawling out of the water upon a berg. Brain, in the mean time, had commenced his attack upon floating masses, where he remained in an attitude of dignified composure, watching the men as they exhausted themselves in their efforts to escape until, until the current had carried him into a fog-bank that hid the group from his sight. The crew were picked up by a passing vessel after a long and weary day, but many weeks elapsed before the injured seaman recovered the use of his limbs.

The food of the white bear is chiefly derived from fish, seals, and dead whales; but, as may well be supposed, it can not always obtain enough to satisfy its voracious appetite. Then it is sometimes in a famishing condition, and when such is the case it is really a formidable animal. It will not then hesitate to attack any creature that it sees, is ready to engage in battle with the largest whale that careens through the northern seas.

At daylight on the morning of the 26th of August, 1854, while the ship Norman, a surveying craft, was lying becalmed near the western edge of one of those interminable fields of ice so frequently encountered in the Arctic Ocean, the watch on deck were suddenly startled by a savage growl, which seemed to proceed almost directly beneath us from the weather bow. Almost at the same instant we heard the loud rippling of water, followed by a noise like the rushing of steam from a vessel just coming to the rail, we beheld a scene that was well calculated to excite our interest and curiosity.

A large white bear, that could not have measured less than twelve feet in length, but which was very lean and lank, had come up to the ice-edge of a block of ice, about ten fathoms from the bank, where it stood glaring with a hungry expression of ferocity upon a huge bull whale, that was quietly and rollingly along toward the same berg, evidently unconscious of the presence of the beast. I say "unconscious," because with a deep growl, more like the monster, and the leviathan, owing to the position of its eyes, can not see any object before it in a straight line.

It continued, therefore, to approach its enemy until it was about a fathom from the spot occupied by the monster, with a deep growl, when it would probably with the intention of changing its course —and for the first time saw the bear. At the same moment the latter, with a deep growl, threw itself forward the whale, but only to receive from the great, barnacled head of the monster a tremendous blow, that was accompanied with a deep growl of rage and pain against the jagged edge of the ice.

Perceiving that its antagonist was "battering-ram" which had already given him sufficient notice of its strength and power was still moving toward him, the bear, with the intention of preventing its reaching death against the frozen drift, Brain now darted to one side and, quickly attacking his antagonist upon the flank, fastened his sharp teeth in the rough hump of the gigantic swimmer. But the old king of the sea seemed not at all inclined to submit for death, and, turning his huge carcass half from side to side, fiercely lashing the water with his flukes, and using other endeavors to dislodge his adversary.

But the bear still clung to him with a tenacious grasp until the enraged bull, evidently losing all patience, tried the effect of a cold-water bath upon his enemy. Down went his great head and up went his flukes, as he dove into the liquid chambers of the sea; and a moment afterward Brain rose to the surface puffing, snarling, and growling with unmitigated rage.

By this time the shrouds, the fore-top, the cathead, the spritsail-yard, and even the jib-boom of the Norman were alive with grinning spectators—old tars and youngsters with broad-rimmed hats and wide collars—while the gun-room officers and the midshipmen crowded the taffrail and the gangway. All hands were now of the opinion, however, that the contest was finished—that the bear had had enough of the fight and would scramble upon the ice, while its adversary would not again dare to renew the battle.

In fact Brain was now swimming toward the berg, as though anxious to get out of the water as soon as possible, and some of the men had already begun to descend the shrouds, when suddenly the surface of the sea in the vicinity of the bear was agitated by a number of little ripples; then followed a roaring noise; and the next moment the poor animal was tossed about fifteen feet into the air, as the great head of its mighty antagonist, arising from the deep, struck the under portion of its body.

"Ay, ay, now, but that's too bad," cried an old shell-backed seaman.

"I think it serves him right," said the ship's corporal; "a regular bloodsucker, do 'you see, and therefore had no business to interfere with that old humpbacked tar that's in his own element."

As the bear came down after having been thus unmercifully tossed, the whale received it upon its (the whale's) flukes and sent it flying upward again; and although the bear must have been considerably injured, yet when it struck the water, it made another flank attack upon the monster; and at the same time dove under it, with the back of its adversary, planted its claws and its teeth in the blubber, to which it clung tenaciously.

Enraged beyond all control, the bull, as before, now exerted itself to dislodge the beast, but without success; and the captain of the Norman was remarking to his first officer that he believed the whale would be obliged to try the effect of another cold-water bath, when the "old king" suddenly rushed forward, and, lifting its head and flukes, struck heavily nearly his full length out of the water.

And it was truly a grand, an awful spectacle—the huge, dark body of that mighty leviathan, towering high in air, where it remained poised for an instant, exposed to the view of every man, and then fell back into the water with a crash equal to the din of a broadside!

A great cloud of spray enveloped the whale as it struck the water, and it even flung upon the forecastle—and the vessel trembled with the shock caused by the falling of that tremendous living mass. But the bear was dead and was simultaneously discharged every gun in the craft.

Then, amidst the hissing foam of agitated waves, as saw the bear, which had been thrown from its tenacious grasp, but which was still undismayed, and ready to renew the attack. It was now making part of the carcass of its foe toward the whale's head, and it would soon doubtless have obtained another hold and cut the leviathan, mustering all its tremendous strength, again breached, although not quite so high as it did before. High enough it was, however, to enable it to descend upon the living creature beneath it; and so it happened that the bear, before it could avoid the impending blow, received upon its shoulders and form the full weight of this living mountain when it came down, thundering into the sea!

Having thus accomplished its work, the whale dove into its watery home, leaving behind it upon the surface the mutilated remains of its late antagonist, the white bear; and during the remainder of the day this singular battle afforded all hands—not even excepting the officers—an interesting topic of conversation.

The majority of the seamen expressed the opinion that Brain had received his deserts for meddling with an "old king;" while a few termed the whale "a regular bully," and one and all, declared they were sorry that the gallant king of Arctic shores had been destroyed. "He had rough-looking old bull" from the realms of Neptune.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

SCIENCE.—A Lecture on the Great Distance of the Sun from the Earth will shortly be given by a Member of the Holy Ark Society.

A lecturer was dilating upon the powers of the magnet, defying any one to show or name any thing surpassing its power. A quarter hereupon, sad instances a young lady, who used to attract him thirteen miles every Sunday.

The difficulty of acquiring our language which a foreigner must experience is illustrated by the following question: "Tell me, please, when a person gave an apple or a pear with a pair of scissors?"

An idle fellow complained bitterly of his hard lot, and said that he was born on the first day of the year, the last day of the month, and the last day of the week, and he had always been unfortunate. He believed that he would have been a hundred pounds in his pocket if he had not been born at all.

Passing through the streets of Detroit a few days since in company with a waggish, observing fellow, he offered to wager cyprers that he could tell one half of the persons we come to be met by traveling a given distance on the most frequented thoroughfare in the city would be wearing gum or some other substance. We supposed the shopkeeper, and, unhesitatingly, took the betting, as once accepted the wager. After traveling in the neighborhood of a mile we were forced to own that we had completely beaten us, and to our chagrin were compelled to pay the oysters.

A CONUNDRUM FROM A SPINSTER.—Why should there be more marriages in winter than summer?—Because in winter the gentlemen require comforters and the ladies muffs.

At the ——, the other evening, one gentleman pointed out a decidedly seedy individual to his friend as a sculptor. "What!" said his friend, "such a looking chap as that a sculptor! Surely you must be mistaken." "He may not be the kind of one you mean," said the informant, "but I know that he chisels a tailor out of a suit of clothes last week."

A gentleman being asked "What was the price of drink?" confessed that he could not tell; for he had been out that very day with his wife, and she had purchased so less than a bonnet, a shawl, a dress, a cloak, a mantle, a dress; secondly, "a duck" of a parasol; and thirdly, "a duck" of a bonnet.

A Dutchman being advised to rub his limbs well with brandy for rheumatism, said he had tried of this remedy, but added, "I dunk better as dat—I drinks de brandy, and den I rubs my leg mit de pottle."

Why is a railway train the exact reverse of an army?—Because it generally has the van at its rear.

The Duchess of Newcastle, who was a great writer of plays and romances in the time of Charles II., asked Bishop Wilkins, who had just announced his discovery of a world in the moon, how she could get there? "In the journey," said she, "must needs be very long, there will be a necessity of inns, where we may refresh stopping by the way." "Your Grace," replied the Bishop, "I can be at no loss how to prove to stop at, as you have built so many castles in the air."

REBEL CRUELTIES.

WE purpose, in the following brief narrative, to indicate by a few facts the character of the treatment our loyal and fairly stated, the manner in which Union prisoners have been dealt with by the rebel authorities. To some this statement will be distasteful—for there are many who desire to believe no evil of DAVIS and his fellows, however indisputable the proofs. To many a loyal and patriotic reader it may be needless pride for deceit recital. Yet it is a true record, and in the history of the rebellion will form an important chapter, to be read with tears, indeed, but written in adamant.

The illustrations on page 380 will bring to the eye features of suffering which could be more vividly described by the pen. They have been selected, not because they were more effective than a hundred others which might be brought forward, but because we had not space to give all. We have limited our illustrations to a special class of our prisoners, namely, those who from exposure and lack of food have lost their feet. These illustrations are the exact facsimiles of photographs. They do not come to us from a distance. A large number of these pictures have been for a long time within an hour's ride of this city. Of the men represented in our illustrations some were in the prisoners' parole and sent to Wilmington on the 26th of March two hundred and eighty-seven in number. Of these, from starvation and frost in Southern prisons, lost their feet wholly or in part. These cases were placed in the hands of Charles A. Gaul, M.D., of the Seventy-Second or Eighty-third Ohio Volunteers. Chaplain GERE, from whom we received the photographs, and whose professional services in behalf of the sufferers secured the comfort of these unfortunate men. But his statements do not stand alone. Others have visited the hospital in which the prisoners were confined. One of them writes:

"I wish every eye in the land could rest on the poor fellows in their present crippled, and emaciated state who believes in treating leniently this rebellion, could go as I did and look at them and see the blankets laid on to expose a pair of stumps from which the feet had rotted off by cold and exposure. And this not in one case, not in two, ten, nor twenty, but scores! Men who had committed no crime, but were honorable soldiers, brave, loyal, true to their Government, but made prisoners by the fortunes of war, and as such entitled to feed and comfortable shelter. As I went from bed to bed, and from ward to ward, and found, now a son of Massachusetts, next, a boy from Maine, then a soldier from Michigan, or from Indiana, or New York, Ohio, Illinois—one scarcely only in some new and more horrid form of gangrene of the feet and legs, which left the most unyielding surrendering of tether beyond the flesh, decaying, putrid, offensive, while they could be strengthened with food a few days and made able to tear an amputation. I felt almost unable to endure the strain upon my sensibilities."

These unhappy prisoners have under oath given the record of their terrible experience, which, in many cases, is too loathsome for detail. You do not want to know, gentle reader, to what means these men swear they were obliged to resort to keep from absolutely starving. Only the very strong survived at all, and these come back to us pitiable wrecks of what they once were—how pitiable let our illustrations show. Nearly all whose affidavits have been taken attest that they were robbed of their clothing, receiving in its place a dirty blanket or a bundle of tattered rags. In regard to all the prisons the uniform testimony is that no shelter of any kind was provided for the prisoners; that they were thrown into stockades and exposed to all sorts of weather; and that they had not received rations adequate to sustain vitality. BYRON CHURCHILL swears that when he was captured he was by the sanction of rebel authority robbed of all his clothing except his shirt and drawers; that the prisoners for want of other shelter burrowed in the ground, and that "by reason of exposure, starvation, cruelties, and countless outrages inflicted on him by the rebels while a prisoner in their hands, a part of the time he was bereft of his reason, lost all the toes on his left foot," and has otherwise been reduced to the condition shown in the illustration.

CALVIN BATES testifies that "by reason of exposure and other inhumanities practiced upon him at Andersonville his feet decayed so that both of them have since been cut off at the ankle with scissors, and that previous to his imprisonment he was in good health.

JOHN H. MATTHEWS, a corporal in Company F of the Fourth Pennsylvania, testifies that he enlisted in this company August 29, 1861; was taken prisoner October 12, 1863, in MEADE'S retreat from Culpeper; and that after various marching and counter-marching he was taken to Richmond. For three days he was without any food. He testifies that in long marches which the prisoners were compelled to make from one place of confinement to another the rebel authorities issued, for three days' rations, one pint of shelled corn. This prisoner lost the use of both his feet.

Many of these sworn statements were the words of dying men. Others still live, monuments of the wanton cruelty of the rebel authorities.

We have stated that there were two hundred and eighty-seven cases of the character represented by our illustrations. On the 9th of April there were still left at Andersonville, Georgia, 2500 poor fellows, who remained there because they were unable to march.

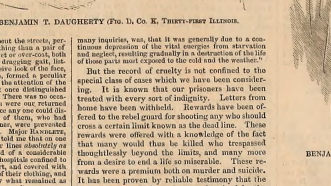
As soon as these prisoners return to us they are treated with all possible kindness. None of those heroes who have died on the battle-field are more worthy of remembrance than such men as Doctors PALMER and BIZZELL, who literally worked themselves to death in their efforts to alleviate the sufferings of our prisoners. Many of these famished prisoners came to us so exhausted that they are unable to receive proper food, and many of them die from the change in diet.

DR. J. C. DALTON, Professor of Physiology and Microscopic Anatomy in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in this city, thus reports respecting the general condition of the prisoners delivered up at Wilmington:

"The better cases were walking about the streets, perhaps barefooted, or with no other clothing than a pair of white cotton drawers and an old blanket or overcoat, both equally ragged. In these the slow, dragging gait, listless manner, and cavernous, inexpressive look of the face, together with the general emaciation, formed a peculiar aspect, by which they alone attracted the attention of the passer-by, and by which they were at once distinguished from the other newly-arrived soldiers. There was no occasion to inquire in Wilmington which were our returned prisoners; after half a day's experience any one could distinguish them at a glance. Many of them, who had strength to carry about in this manner, were prevented from doing so by the want of clothing. Major RANDLETT, the Provost Marshal of Wilmington, told me that on one day forty of them came into our lines absolutely as naked as they were born. I inquired of a considerable number of them, whom I saw in the hospitals confined to their beds, naked or with only a shirt, and covered with a hospital blanket, what had become of their clothing, and was told that they had thrown away what remained as soon as they could obtain shelter, because it was so ragged, filthy, and full of vermin. One of them, on being told that the Sanitary Commission had sent them flannel shirts and drawers, caught at the word with a childish eagerness and repeated the good news to his companions with a faint, half-sarcastic smile, so long as I was within hearing. With the great majority of the feebler ones personal cleanliness was a thing which they appeared to have entirely forgotten. They no longer retained sufficient strength, either of mind or body, to appreciate or correct the degradation to which months of unavoidable uncleanliness had reduced them. In the most extreme cases the condition of the mind, as well as the expression of the face, was absolutely fatuous, and the aspect of the patient was not that of a strong man reduced by illness, but that of an idiotic pauper, who had been such from his birth. Nevertheless, several of the surgeons informed me that the condition of the patients had visibly improved since their reception, and that I could not then form an adequate idea of what it was when they arrived at Wilmington. In that case it must have been lamentable beyond description.

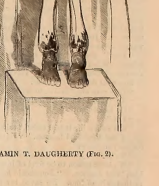
"The testimony of both men and officers was uniform as to the causes of their unfortunate condition. These causes were, first, starvation, and, second, exposure. Only such officers and men as could procure money were able to obtain any thing like sufficient nourishment. Some of them told me that during the entire winter they had received absolutely no meat; a pint of corn-meal, often with the cob ground in, sometimes with wood sometimes without salt, a handful of "corn-peas," and sometimes sorghum molasses, constituted their daily ration. When in hospital, they had only very thin corn-meal gruel, and a little corn-bread. To the debility occasioned by this insufficient food was added that resulting from exposure. It was a common thing for a prisoner, immediately on being taken, to be stripped of his clothing—often, even, of his boots, shirts, and drawers—and to be left with only vermin and worn-out pairs of drawers, and perhaps an equally worn-out shirt and blanket given him in exchange. This robbery of clothing was in general the work of our rebel officers. Even an assistant surgeon, who was captured within four miles of Richmond, told me that he was robbed of his flannel shirt while standing in front of the Libby Prison, and in presence of the rebel officer in charge of the squad. This was immediately after his arrival in the city, and when he had been, for the three days succeeding his capture, entirely without food. With the scanty clothing thus left them the men were generally, in the winter, often without any shelter excepting such as they could contrive to provide by excavating a sort of rifle-pit in the ground, and covering it with old blankets or canvas, on which the snow fell in inefficient heaps, and sometimes entirely wasting. Even in the hospitals their suffering from cold was very great.

"One of the most melancholy sights in Wilmington was that to be seen at the hospitals. In these hospitals were collected all those patients who had lost their feet, either wholly or in part, by freezing, from their exposure during the past winter, and this in a well-wooded country. In some of them two or three toes only, on one or both feet, were gangrened, and in process of separating by ulceration; in others both feet had entirely separated, and the patients were awaiting the time when their general strength and the condition of the stump would warrant a final amputation. In many cases the patients ascribed this gangrene directly to frost-bite received on particular occasions; in others to their illness from which they were suffering—generally fever combined with exposure. My own impression, derived from the result of many inquiries, was, that it was generally due to a continuous depression of the vital energies from starvation and exposure, resulting gradually in a destruction of the life of those parts most exposed to the cold and the weather."



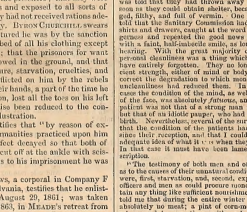
But the record of cruelty is not confined to the special class of cases which we have been considering. It is known that our prisoners have been treated with every sort of indignity. Letters from home have been withheld. Rewards have been offered to the rebel guard for shooting any who should cross a certain limit known as the dead line. These rewards were offered with a knowledge of the fact that many would thus be killed who trespassed thoughtlessly beyond the limits, and many more from a desire to end a life so miserable. These rewards were a premium both on murder and suicide. It has been proven by reliable testimony that the Libby Prison at Richmond was undermined for the purpose of blowing it up in case any of our cavalry raids should succeed in entering the rebel capital—thus retaliating for a legitimate act of war by an act of useless and wanton cruelty inflicted upon innocent men.

These cruelties were not the result of accident but of a deliberate purpose. By this we do not mean that the Southern people were committed to these acts. In many cases their humanity compelled them, though in opposition to the authorities, to attempt the alleviation of the sufferings which they witnessed. When our wasted prisoners entered Wilmington, before the capture of that city, many of the citizens tried to supply them with food, but were kept from doing so by an armed force of rebel soldiers. In a letter written to General WRIGHT by Colonel OULD, March 17, 1863, the latter says:



"The arrangements I have made (for exchanging prisoners) work largely in our favor. We get rid of a set of miserable wretches and receive some of the best material I ever saw."

HENRY S. FOOTE, the rebel Senator, offered to go before a court of justice and testify to the fact that a portion of the rebel Congress once visited MR. DAVIS to remonstrate against the treatment of Union prisoners, and the petition was refused by MR. DAVIS and his cabinet on the ground of policy merely. We have read in history of terrible cruelties inflicted upon the defenseless in revolutionary times. We understand how it was in the streets of Paris, when poor men had cried for bread in vain, and at length resorted to violence. There is some poor plea, too, for those, who, in the excitement of battle, cry "No quarter!" and slay their prisoners on the spot. But who ever heard before of men who called themselves Christians coolly and deliberately starving men to death for no other crime than that of fighting for their country? And yet MR. MITCHEL, the new editor of the Daily News, tells us that DAVIS has waged an honorable war, according to all the high usages of a Christian and civilized age.



The rebellions of which history takes note have had various aspects. Rebel leaders have not always been instigators of arson and murder. There have been rebels who have even elicited the respect of honorable minds. But DAVIS and his fellows have chosen for themselves a blacker record. Not content to have been the cause of the most needless war ever waged, they have affiliated themselves with crimes which are revolting to every Christian civilization except that of the chivalrous, slave-holding South.

REBEL SOLDIERS TAKING THE OATH OF ALLEGIANCE IN THE SENATE CHAMBER AT RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

THE SANITARY FAIR AT CHICAGO.

We publish on this page an illustration of the Sanitary Fair building at Chicago. The Fair was opened on Tuesday, May 30. Governor OGLESBY delivered an address upon the occasion, and T. BUCHANAN READ read a poem. It was a great day in Chicago. The streets were thronged with a long procession of people. Preparations have long been making for this event. It is intended that a portion of the proceeds of the Fair shall be devoted to the erection of a Soldiers' Home in Chicago.

It is estimated that there are 300,000 sick and wounded soldiers now in hospital all over the land. These will require months of careful treatment. It is evident, therefore, that the work of the Sanitary Commission is not yet fully accomplished. As this noble association followed our brave soldiers to the field so must they precede them as they return with their beneficent provisions. We notice that Professor GOLDWIN SMITH has contributed to the Fair at Chicago an exquisite painting by Mr. BRITON RIVIERE. He says: "I wish I were a millionaire that I might make a more valuable offering."

Brandreth's Pills.

Contiveness, Diarrhœa.

They are taken up by the abandoned and carried into the circulation, through which medium they are conveyed to every part of the body.

If the pain affects the joints a single dose produces remarkable benefit. And the same rule applies to contiveness, diarrhœa, and dysentery; though with the last-named they require to be followed up with a dose or two before decided relief is obtained. In affections of the lungs, throat, head, and pleurisy, the relief is certain; the excretory organs throw off an immense phlegm, and the breathing and respiration free. Spasmodic asthma is often cured by a single dose.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, and retained in that price. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

Uncurrent States
7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES,
$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscription.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-Thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and continuously thereafter.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the Seven-Thirties.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so much increase the value of the principal, that persons with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $280,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Certificates of the various articles are first printed, and immediately after the order is received, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus showing to the purchaser the nature of the certificate you will see what you are to have, and then it is at your option to send the dollar and take the article or not. What the "Press" say of us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining a valuable watch, diamond rings, silverware, etc., by Messrs. Arrandale & Co., at No. 107 Broadway, New York.—Evening Express, May 10, 1865.

We have inspected at the office of Arrandale & Co.'s Agency for Great Manufacturing Jewelers, a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewelry of the newest designs. We also noticed a large quantity of silver ware, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of in a novel principle, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We have been assured that this is a very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and therefore we have much pleasure in recommending it.—N. Y. Advisor, Sept. 5, 1864.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co., the arrangement the advantages must be on the side of the customer, for he has every chance to gain, and nothing comparatively to lose. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—N. Y. Evening Mail, Aug. 6, 1864.

DELIGHTFUL OFFER FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in the business, not only in filling her own purse, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold certificates, as she has in every case given entire satisfaction. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—N. Y. Evening Express, May 10, 1864.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co.'s Gift Concert, offering watches, jewelry, and silverware. In payment of that advertisement we have received several such concerts advertised, and we are warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they exceeded what might reasonably be looked for at cost to the recipients, and some of them six times.

We have seen some very costly specimens of Dubie and Tan Spoons, Gold Watches, Ladies' chains, Pins, Bracelets etc., which have been sent by Arrandale & Co. to their place for $1 each.—Anglican Reporter, N. Y. Star, Feb. 18, 1865.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will find it to their interest to call at the office named by them, provided their remittance amounts to One Dollar, when they will receive 25 cents for every hundred sale, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

BEST FARMING LANDS IN THE WORLD!
For Sale by the Illinois Central Railroad Company,
In Tracts to suit Purchasers, AT LOW PRICES.
THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY HAVE FOR SALE,
900,000 ACRES OF THE BEST FARMING LANDS IN THE COUNTRY.

The road extends from Dunleith, in the north western part of the State, to Cairo, in the extreme southern part, with a branch from Centralia, one hundred and thirteen miles north of Cairo, to Chicago, at the head of Lake Michigan, making a length of 704 miles—and the land which is offered for sale is situated upon either side of the track, in no instance at a greater distance than fifteen miles.

State of Illinois.

The rapid development of Illinois, its steady increase in population and wealth, and its capacity to produce cheap food, are matters for wonder and admiration. The United States Commissioner of Agriculture estimates the product of the principal crops of Illinois for the present year as follows: Corn, 172,800,000 bushels; oats, 12,600,000 bushels; oil, 1,000,000 bushels; wheat, 16,000,000 bushels; potatoes, 3,000,000 bushels; hay, 1,000,000 tons; and tobacco, 100,000,000 pounds. The number of bushels of wheat, the tons of hay, and the bushels of potatoes will be nearly more than one-fourth of the corn, more than one-fifth of the wheat, and almost one-seventh of the oats produced in all the United States.

Grain—Stock Raising.

For eminently the best in the list of grain exporting States, Illinois is now, and will for the present retain the position of the largest producer of corn, and is the second in the important interests of pork packing, prairies are well adapted by nature to the raising of cattle, sheep, horses and mules, and the unequaled facilities for reaching the best markets with the products of the farm, no other State can offer greater inducements for raising stock. The Illinois Central Railroad Company has sold 1,500,000 acres, or more than one-fourth of the whole quantity of land granted to the State, and during the last year 264,421 acres—a larger aggregate of sales than in any one year since the opening of the road. The farms are not in tracts of forty or fifty acres, suited to the settler with limited capital, but are sold in large bodies, at low prices, on long credit and stock raisers. The soil is of unsurpassed fertility; the climate is healthy; water pure and abundant; timber and stone are accessible in all parts of the State, and intersected with all the great markets it make easy through railroads, canals and rivers.

PRICES AND TERMS OF PAYMENT.

The price of lands varies from $8 to $15 and upwards per acre, and they are sold on short credit, or for cash. A deduction of ten per cent. from the short credit price is made to those who buy for cash.

EXAMPLE:

Forty acres at $10 per acre, on credit; the principal one-quarter cash down—balance one, two and three years, at six per cent. interest, in advance, each year.

	INTEREST.	PRINCIPAL.		INTEREST.	PRINCIPAL.
Cash Payment.....	$24 00	$100 00	Payment in two years.....	12 00	100 00
Payment in one year.....	12 00	100 00	Payment in three years.....	6 00	100 00

The Same Land may be Purchased for $360 Cash.

Full information on all points, together with maps, showing the exact location of Lands, will be furnished on application, in person or by letter, to

THE FREEDMAN'S SONG.

De Lord, He make us free indeed
In His own time an' way;
We plant de rice an' cotton seed,
An' see de sprout some day:
We know it come, but not de why—
De Lord know more dan we;
We 'spected freedom by-an'-by,
An' now we all are free.
Praise de Lord! Praise de Lord!
For now we all are free.

De North is on de side of right,
An' full of men, day say;
An' dere, when poor man work, at night
He sure to get his pay;
De Lord, He glad dey are so good,
An' make dem dery strong;
An' when dey called to give dere blood
Dey all come right along.
Praise de Lord! Praise de Lord!
Dey all come right along.

Dey blue coats cover all de ground,
An' make it like de sky:
An' dery grayback loafing roun'
He tink it time to fly:
We not afraid; we bring de child
An' stan' beside de door,
An' ob! we hug it very wild,
An' keep it evermore.
Praise de Lord! Praise de Lord!
We keep it evermore.

De master's come back from his tramp,
'Years he is broken quite:
He takes de basket to de camp
For rations every night;
Dey fought him when he had and strong,
Dey feed him when he low,
Dey say dey will forgive de wrong
And bid him 'pent and go.
Praise de Lord! Praise de Lord!
Dey bid him 'pent and go.

De rice is higher far dis year,
De cotton taller grow;
De lowest corn-silk on de ear
Is higher than de hoe;
De Lord He lift up every ting
'Cept rebel in his grave;
De people bress de Lord an' sing
He is no longer slave.
Praise de Lord! Praise de Lord!
De negro no more slave.

THE PRESENT PERIL.

It took seventy-five years to teach this country that fire will burn. Against the instincts of the human heart, against the dictates of common sense, against reason and all experience we insisted upon yielding every thing to Slavery in a free Government, until Slavery took the Government by the throat, and only by the most prolonged and desperate struggle was thrown off. In like manner, against all reason and experience which assured us that sovereignty is one and can not be divided, that a nation can be injured in no part without suffering every where, that the law of life in communities is like that in individuals, we allowed the mischievous Kentucky and Virginia resolutions to remain as a vague apology for treason, instead of seeing that where such resolutions could be adopted and defended there was the utmost necessity of a solemn national renunciation of them by a constitutional amendment forever settling the question. Sufferance made treason insolent; servility made it strong; until the authority of the State struck at the national supremacy, and only by flooding every Southern stone with blood, and hosting our children with debt, was the national authority restored.

Have we yet learned that the spirit of Slavery, which to actually buy and sells human beings like cattle, or despises and outrages them as pariahs, is the spirit of eternal war; and that the doctrine of State Sovereignty, whether it "nullify calls a negro's patent, or a civil engineer's division of land, a nation, or asserts the reserved rights of States, means, substantially, treason? It would be ludicrous, if it were not too sad, to see those who are still stunned by the war doubting whether the men who excited and conducted it can possibly be capable of any naughty action. There are the horrible pens of Millen and Andersonville; the unimaginable suffering inflicted upon innocent men there; the cold-blooded slaughters of Fort Pillow and Lawrence; the hangings and tortures of Union men in East Tennessee, in Texas, in all the South and Southwest; there are the plots to burn great cities, the firing of hotels and museums and theatres full of innocent women and children: there are the plans of infecting whole districts with fatal disease by the yellow-fever rags; there are the massacres of helpless negroes in the streets; there is the murder of the President in a theatre; the murderous attempt upon the Secretary of State lying ill in his bed—and some good soul asks, "Do you really think they would be guilty of murder?" They may be politically mistaken, but do you seriously think they would do any thing unfair?"

Could we seriously think otherwise? How is it natural to suppose that those who breed children for sale, whose laws and social and industrial habits are designed to imbrute human beings, would wage war? Is it not by every foul and dishonorable means? Is it not by poison, by assassination, by massacre? Why should not savages be savage? JEFFERSON DAVIS was called "a high-toned Southern gentleman." Doubtless he was as much of a gentleman and as high-toned as any man bred in such a condition of things could be. But what his gentlemanhood and high tone were you discover when you read his speeches, in which Yankees are hyenas, and GRANT and SHERMAN are spaniels to be whipped. There were lovely and accomplished women in the Slave States; but when they spoke of slavery their bald barbarity dehumanized them. The blood chilled in the heart to hear their flippant or fiery talk. They were like the smooth-skinned wives and daughters of ogres in fairy tales.

Is it unkind to recall these things? Is it a poor policy of conciliation to recur to the old offenses? Oh no: they are not old offenses. This was the spirit of that society, and it is its spirit still. Can we wisely forget it? Can we make it otherwise by pretending not to know it? Are GUSTAVE A. SCHEPELER and JACOB THOMPSON and BEVERLY TUCKER and CLEMENT C. CLAY any the less criminal foes of the Government of this nation because they less failed to its fundamental doctrines, are less dangerous and dishonorable men, to be shunned in every way, and exposed to public obloquy and constant suspicion, because DAVID CREECY calls them only "distinguished Americans of the other party to our civil war?" ARE HUNTER, CAMPBELL, and STEPHENS any less dangerous because the same authority calls them "eminent Confederates?" Is the ostrich the model of a statesman? Are wolves mild and docile because you call them lambs?

The men who control Southern sentiment are baffled, they are not changed. They are beaten in the war—that is all. Are they less hostile? Do they confess that they had no right to make war? Do they believe that States are not sovereign? Do they acknowledge the equality of human rights? Do they hate Yankees any less because the Yankees have whipped them? The ladies of the rebel States, who are reduced from the luxury based upon the unpaid toil and unsold wrongs of human beings to gain a livelihood by mechanical labor or to receive Government rations—are they less bitter and mad than before? The beggared man, who live on charity and sneer with irrepressible hate at the "Federal" Government—are they changed at heart? Mayor MAYO, of Richmond, whom General PRENTISS MITCHELL—is he any safer citizen of the United States than when he was in active rebellion three months ago? The North Carolina planter whom Mr. SUMNER, CHURCH, Provost-Marshal at Richmond, told that he must not whip his slaves at present, but that a good time was coming—is he a type of the "distinguished American" who went to our civil war" who are to reorganize the late slave States? The Alabama delegation, the Mississippi Governor, BOYCE from South Carolina, BROWN from Georgia—are these the "eminent Confederates' with whom, shutting our eyes and minds, and pocketing common-sense, we are to fraternize in a restored Union? Are the Yankees bygones, do you say? And what by-gone do they forget? What dangerous dogma, what treasonable illusion do they give up now that they have renounced? The rebels carry the State election in Virginia. Are they to send representatives to Congress? A palpable charlatan like GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN is hooted by a mob by the nose at Niagara. Are abler and wilier leaders than SANDERS incapable of hoodwinking more sagacious men than Mr. SUMNER?

This country needs as much watchful intelligence to save it now as it needed skillful military guidance to save it two years ago. The rebellion gives up the field, but does not give up the fight. The New York World asked two months ago, advising the rebels to submit, what can the President do, what terms can he make if they will only throw down their arms and return to the Union? That was to say to the rebels, as plainly as words could express it, "Claim your rights as States, and we will help you." SANDERS makes the same appeal from Canada, foolishly speaking above his breath and out of time.

Have we learned that fire will burn? Do we yet understand that the chief duty of the loyal people of the United States is to suffer the late slave States to be reorganized upon such terms as those people prescribe? Do we fully comprehend that the important point is not speedy reorganization, but sure reorganization? Is it true that we should, as in the case of Virginia should be governed as a territory for half a century rather than that she should be recognized as a State by the spirit of State Sovereignty and caste which produced the rebellion? Congress must decide the question. Let Congress, then, distinctly understand its opinion. Let every body speak out. We are in no danger of treating any body too severely. This country was never yet too severe upon any citizens but those who warned it of the danger of intrusting a free government to the hands of those who had no faith in its principles. We are not in danger of a bloodthirsty policy but of our old obsequious pusillanimity, and a sentimental sophistication in which the true character and relation of men and things at this juncture will be forgotten and the country plunged into new perils. Wise men will insist at every hazard that the lessons of experience shall be heeded, and that the peace and welfare of the country shall be secured by placing the political power of the reorganized States in the hands of those only, and all of those, who utterly repudiate State Sovereignty, and all civil distinction based upon color; for only such men only, are truly trustworthy citizens of the United States.

THE COTTON QUESTION.

GOLD is up again above 140, and many predict that it will pass 150 before the autumn; which means a further depreciation of the currency, higher prices for food, fuel, and clothing, and renewed financial embarrassment.

Efforts are still made in certain quarters to delude the public into the belief that the advance in gold is the work of speculators: that a few dozen Jews by combining together have succeeded in depreciating the currency five per cent. in a fortnight. But this balderdash deceives none but very ignorant people. It is now pretty generally understood that speculators can not control the price of gold than chips in a tideway can control the ebb and flow of the sea; that the premium rises and falls in obedience to immutable laws of political economy. Gold fell from 170 to 130 because the armies of the United States won victory after victory, and at last crushed the rebellion and restored confidence in public credit. It has risen from 130 to 140 on the purely commercial ground of the excess of our imports over our exports. We are consuming more foreign goods than we are exporting domestic produce, and to supply the deficiency we have been compelled to export, for the past month, about $2,000,000 of gold a week, which has diminished the supply in the market and increased the demand. In the darkest days of the war, when there was ground for apprehension that our last golden dollar might be carried from us to pay for tea, coffee, and foreign luxuries, far-seeing Dutchmen unconsciously carried us through by taking Five-Twenty Bonds. But this resource is no longer available. Bonds are coming home—at the rate of half a million to a million a week—instead of going out. And if the fall imports are to be heavy as the profitable spring trade foreshadowed, we must either export a great deal more gold, which will of course cause the premium to advance still further, or we must find something else to export.

What shall it be? The prospect is fair for a good harvest in England, and should it prove so, Europe will not expect to ship food enough to affect the rate of exchange. It takes a great many cargoes of wheat and corn to pay for one steamer-load of dry-goods or one shipload of silks. The suspension of specie in payments our exports of grain and flour have footed up very large amounts in a currency worth from 40 to 60 cents on the dollar; but it must be remembered that before the war an export of $50,000,000 of wheat, corn, and flour was considered enormous. And we see no reason for supposing that Europe will want more now than then.

It was confidently expected, when the war drew to a close, that our old staple—cotton—would loom up in great strength; that we should find it encumbering our wharves, filling our ships, paying our foreign debts, and drawing back gold with every bale. This pleasant vision, like so many, alas!—has proved a dream. Peace has been a fact for six weeks, and we are receiving no more cotton than we received the last year, when the Southern Confederacy seemed full of life. Yet the cotton is there, beyond doubt. After some time spent in a careful examination of evidence, and sifting of opinions, we can not estimate the present stock of cotton at the South at less than two million of bales. Texas alone must contain half a million, and a million more, two million bales. In many localities the cotton is unginned, the gin-house having got out of order when the proprietors were conscripted, or when they fled. Many of many the staple can not be moved for want of bagging. But while authorities vary in their estimates from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 bales, all agree that the quantity on hand at the South is large—large enough to turn the balance of trade between the United States and Europe. Every Southern planter, during the long war, had a thought for himself or his family, planted some cotton, and hid it when picked, as something to build upon in the days to come. Every sea-board, every out-of-the-way shed, every dark pine-grove, every swamp, every recess which was likely to escape the prying eyes of the Yankees has been made to contain cotton. If the quantity thus hidden away, added to that which is openly displayed in stores and ginhouses, amounts to 2,000,000 bales, which is a moderate estimate, it would be worth, at present prices, over $400,000,000. If the price fell fifty per cent., which is not very likely, it would still be worth over $200,000,000—more than enough to bring exchange down, and force gold to a moderate premium.

The causes which prevent this cotton coming to market are threefold:

1. Government Restrictions.—At the outset, after the surrender of the rebel armies, when wholesale confiscation of cotton ceased, Government levied a tax of 25 per cent. on the value thereof, and assumed a monopoly of the right of purchase. This rule has since been somewhat modified. But still the trade in cotton is so far from free that sending cotton South to buy cotton is still classed in mercantile circles as an adventurous operation, much like blockade-running or taking rebels as a goldmine. Conservative houses will not embark capital in it.

2. The Confiscation Act.—No authoritative exposition of the policy of the Government in regard to the enforcement of this act has yet been made public. It is clear that the bulk of the cotton at the South is the property of individuals whose property of all kinds is forfeited to the United States Government, if that Government choose to enforce its confiscation. And it is also clear that most of these owners of cotton belong to a class which is expressly excluded from the benefit of President JOHNSON'S Proclamation of Amnesty. In their case, therefore, the motive to send their cotton to market is wanting. Why disturb their hoard if it be probable they will derive no benefit from it? If the cotton can not return before it can be sent to it market for the benefit of their conquerors.

3. The Want of Capital.—This is probably the great cause of the non-arrival of cotton at the ports. It has always taken a large amount of capital to move cotton. At times a stringent money-market in New York has always accounted for by Southern drafts upon this city to supply the money required for this purpose. Now, the amount needed must be larger than ever. Money can be paid to hired negroes to pick the cotton. Money is wanted for bagging and rope. It costs money to haul the cotton from the plantation, gin-house, or hiding-place to a steamboat landing. The steamboat charges more money than ever to carry it to a sea-port or distributing centre. A swarm of tax-gatherers want money before they will let it move a step. And to face all this the wretched planter has nothing resembling money but JEFF DAVIS's shinplasters, worth 6 cents a pound. In better times he got money from his factor at New Orleans, Mobile, or Savannah—sometimes, if he were a very smart man, from the banks or from his friends in New York. But where are the complaisant factors, or the liberal banks, or the Northern friends now? Alas! GRANT has swept them all away, and many a Southern planter, with cotton enough to make him almost rich, and to help our exchanges materially, is absolutely starving away in the Southwest.

Of these three obstructions to the movement of cotton Government can remove the first two. It can either enforce the confiscation act—in which case son is resistance to the Government by war. But if war be waged upon a scale sufficiently large seriously to threaten the existence of the Government it ceases to be levying war upon the Government. Such reasoning answers itself. Surely Mr. SMITH does not think that the leaders of the Whisky Insurrection might have been justly punished for treason, while the Government has no rightful hold of DAVIS.

In quoting HALLAM upon the execution of CHARLES I. Mr. SMITH, Mr. SUMNER seems to forget that the illustration is not pertinent. There was no law precisely defining CHARLES's conduct as a capital crime, while DAVIS's has been carefully and minutely described in the fundamental law and the penalty unequivocally determined by statute. MACAULAY, in the very passage from which Mr. SMITH quotes, delivers all comparison of the cases by saying that neither by international nor municipal law was CHARLES a traitor. On the contrary, he says, "The power of CHARLES, it must be admitted, were technically guilty of treason. He might have sent them to the scaffold without violating any established principle of jurisprudence." Yet how could he have done this if the scope of the war had removed the liability of belligerents as traitors? MACAULAY's argument against the execution of CHARLES where ever he alludes to it, and especially in the essay from which Mr. SMITH quotes, is purely one of policy. "One thing, and one alone," says the historian, "could make CHARLES dangerous—a violent death." He exhausts his brilliant rhetoric to prove that the King's execution was a blunder, because it was absolutely unnecessary, and could only be procured by taking several previous steps, every one of which would have required the strongest measures to vindicate. He pleads against the death of the King the only practicable argument that could be urged for the respite of DAVIS, that his violent death is useless and may be a martyr. "And posterity has estimated his character from his death rather than from his life."

No special law, no appeal to history, no argument drawn from the fact of war, can obscure the plain fact that DAVIS's life is forfeit to the law. This is conceded even by the London Times, one of the ablest and most persistent apologetic defamers of this country, and the most unblushing advocate of DAVIS before his failure. It pleads for his life on the ground of policy, and that is, unquestionably, the only ground upon which an appeal for mercy is tenable.

The fate of DAVIS individually, as of any single criminal, is of very little importance; but it is very important that this country should decide how it will regard treason and punish traitors. Those who oppose the execution of the present law plead that DAVIS "simply committed treason." True; and BOOTH simply committed murder. The law awards the same penalty to both offenses. Very serious mitigating circumstances in either case? If so, let us know what they were. DAVIS would probably urge that he believed State Sovereignty justified his action. BOOTH would doubtless have declared that he believed the killing of tyrants was no murder. For ourselves, with no other desire than to give good honor of the country, we repeat, that if this treason does not demand the penalty of the law no treason can; and therefore the law should be spared the law should be changed. Is so grave a law as that against treason intended to reach contemptible enemies only? Is it unwise to be exempted the moment he becomes truly formidable? If not, let the law be changed to conform to the public opinion, that death should not be inflicted for political offenses.

OUR DUTY IN REORGANIZATION.

"PEACE," said EDMUND BURKE, "may be made as unadvisedly as war. Nothing is so rash as fear, and the counsels of pusillanimity very rarely find a path to safety. They only serve to aggravate, the evils from which they would fly." What this country needs to secure peace is the firm application of a plain principle. The principle of human rights, like that of property rights and town rights, is a good one. But the principle of national rights is the paramount and essential principle of the present situation. All subordinate rights whatever must bend to the national necessity of a local government in every State based upon the consent of the whole body of loyal citizens.

The national authority is fully competent to secure that government. There is no reason whatever why the nation should delegate its authority to secure such State governments in the South to a part of the loyal freemen resident there. At this moment no one loyal freeman of South Carolina has any right to a voice in reorganizing the State which every other does not equally possess. There is no more reason, except in the imaginary view of policy, why the national Government should authorize white loyalists alone to reorganize the State government of North Carolina because the voters in that State were formerly white than that it should authorize the colored loyalists alone to reorganize it because they have been always faithful to the nation. As a question of policy merely, it is clear that if any class of loyalists object to reorganize the State upon acknowledged democratic republican principles that is not a class to which the reorganization can be safely intrusted. It is their policy to govern the State directly by the national authority than to relinquish it to such a class.

An apparently well-informed correspondent of the New York Times says, in a late letter from North Carolina: "While many admit that it may be the negro will be qualified to exercise that right in the future, every one says he is not fit or intelligent enough to do so now." "Every one" means, of course, the white population: the class who were formerly among the voters of the State. Yet in the very next paragraph of his letter the correspondent says: "The ignorance of the poorer classes is heart-rending, and their prejudices are inveterate. Not more than one-seventh of the voters can read or write." These are the people who think the negro is not intelligent enough to vote; and these are the white loyalists to whom the apologists and friends of the rebellion insist that the right of voting shall be exclusively given because the colored loyalists are not sufficiently "intelligent!" The same correspondent adds: "They exhibit a prejudice against the slave that readily accounts for the cruelties to which the former was subject to during the war." And it is to these persons that it is proposed the question of suffrage for the colored freemen in the State shall be referred.

Is it surprising that, as a letter in the Herald says, "Among the negroes, however, there is much fear"? Is it surprising that many among the people of the United States, who have still the decision of the question—should there not be shame? Side by side with brothers and friends, upon the soil of both the Carolinas, the colored men, to whom we had given no special cause to love us or to believe in us, fought for their Government and their country. Side by side by side the bodies of the brave men, black and white, mingle in the dust. In a nameless grave upon Morris Island the fair-haired SHAW lies "buried with his negroes," all of them, soldiers and leader, having fought in the full faith that their death secured equal rights for all Americans citizens under the law. So they fought, so they fell, on many a noble field. Shall those who shot them down—those who hated them and the cause which they defended; those who would do have liberty—have the power to starve because their brethren did not die in vain—be allowed to do at the polls what they could not do in battle? They can not do it any where without consent. Can we consent without eternal infamy?

VIGILANCE THE PRICE OF LIBERTY.

WE had little doubt that the Telegraph falsely reported the speech of WENDELL PHILLIPS—and so it proves. What he did say was, that reconstruction was impossible unless the rebel party would lead to a recognition of the rebel debt. Such a policy would be a fraud upon the people, and however solemnly Congress might assume that debt he should not pay for its repudiation. That is a view in which we suppose all honest men agree.

The subject of repudiation is not a new one even in our late history. There have been various hints from the Copperhead leaders of such a policy. And if the political power of the rebellion had been transferred to the South the attempt to make the support of slavery the price of the alliance by which the Democratic party so long maintained its ascendency. Hereafter the slavery interest, surviving as a negro-hating party, will impose other conditions at its will. Very naturally its leaders will not wish to be elected to put the rebel debt upon the people. If they think it wiser to demand general repudiation rather than the recognition of the rebel debt, they will do it, and the Democratic members of the negro-hating party at the North will submit their ready noses to the ring.

The utterly un-American spirit known as "the South," the spirit which denies the popular government and the rights of men, is beaten in the field, and is even now adjusting itself to assert its old supremacy in political control. It will try to recover by intrigue what it has lost by arms; and the people of this country are fools if they cease for a moment to watch and distrust it. It is a dangerous foe, and under a generous, there; and it is mortally perilous until it is entirely and every where extinguished.

MRS. SIGOURNEY.

ONE of the most familiar names in the school reading-books of twenty and thirty years ago has now become historical. The kindly author, Mrs. SIGOURNEY, has recently died at her home in Hartford, at the ripe age of more than seventy years. Without striking or commanding genius, she had that purity of feeling and generous sympathy which exalted her, in thought and simple verse, to a kind of domestic fame which is as extensive as the country. Her works, both in verse and prose, are very numerous, and they are all marked with the same genial amiability and feminine sweetness. Her life was useful and honored, and her death will awaken every where a kindly emotion.

"THE NORWICH LINE."

THE summer traveler who is thinking of his vacation will naturally turn his mind to the White Mountains. Presently, as the heat increases and the city stifles him, he will begin to turn his feet that way, and will actually ask himself how he can most pleasantly and conveniently reach those cool retreats. We shall be surprised if he find any route more delightful than that through the Sound to Norwich, Connecticut, by the steamers The City of New York and The City of Boston. There are no finer boats in the world. They are spacious and clean, and peculiarly comfortable. The route avoids the perils of sound navigation. Captains JEWETT and WILCOX are gentlemanly hosts of a night, from whom the traveler is loth to part.

WAR VIEWS.

MESSRS. ANTHONY & CO., the photographers in New York, have issued a series of stereoscopic "War Views," which are curiously and permanently interesting. The choice of scenes is very felicitous, and the execution of the delicate and difficult. Such views as the Railroad Dépôt at Atlanta, the Sea Face of Fort Sumter, the Dépôt at Chattanooga, Fort Pulaski, and the Monitor Nahant in Cooper's Bay, Cemetery at Charleston, showing the effect of our shells, Rebel soldiers killed in the trenches of "Fort Hell," Confederate Works, the Interior of Fort Sumter, arranged for the services at the raising of the flag, and scores of others of every variety compose a collection of truly historic value.

LITERARY.

SENATOR WILSON'S Anti-Slavery Measures in Congress (WALKER, FULLER, & CO.), is a concise and complete history of the legislation in Congress on the subject from the opening of the war to the passage of the great Amendment. It is a clear, simple, and excellent narrative. Success of the debate upon every point is impartially indicated, and the author uses no adjectives or superfluous words, conscious that the story is sufficient for itself. In no other volume can the development of the anti-slavery sentiment during the war be so plainly studied. What is particularly valuable is that a letter of how upon Senator WILSON's part will be readily understood, for among the names of those who have faithfully and patiently and successfully contributed to the most humane and ennobling result of the war, none is more conspicuous and honorable than that of HENRY WILSON.

Among recent additions to "Harper's Library of Select Novels" are Lucretia, by BULWER, Two Lads, and On Guard, by ANNIE THOMAS, a writer whom the best foreign critics place high among that class of writers who are known as the "Author Belle" ranks first. Her tales may perhaps be best described as double contrasts to the "Wood and Braddon School" of sensation stories. "This," she says at the opening of her latest tale, "is to be no story of guilt, or murder, of murder, mystery, and machinations. The actors in it will be of the order among whom we live and move and have our being. Upon them I shall endeavor to call ruly for creating an interest to the full as deep and true as can be obtained by the powerful portrayal of any or all of the sterling virtues." Lucretia and On Guard are included in the "Library of Select Novels," in a capital story, attributed to MRS. OLIPHANT, author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Laird of Norlaw," "The Chronicles of Carlingford," and several other excellent novels. Summer tourists will find these four stories the worthy of a place in their list of reading for leisure.

DOCHARTY'S Elements of Analytical Geometry and of the Differential and Integral Calculus.—There will, we trust, always be a large number of students, even in our practical age, who remember, who will wish some time and thought to the study of the Pure Mathematics. This volume is designed for the use of this class of students. Professor DOCHARTY does not profess to have thrown up a royal highway through the difficult domain of the Calculus; but he has endeavored to render the path as smooth and plain as the nature of the subject will admit. It is sufficient evidence of the value of the work that it was prepared by the able and experienced Professor of Mathematics in the New York Free Academy; and it must necessarily commend itself to teachers for many years; and that it has been adopted as a textbook in that institution. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

THE reorganization of State governments of the States lately in rebellion is the great work of the day. Even the politico-economical writers in the South depend upon the solution of this higher problem of Government. Commerce and business revive in proportion as order is restored, and success to its citizens his and liberty.

In two States, North Carolina and Virginia—the first steps in President Johnson's reconstructive policy have been taken. Governors Holden and Pierpont have actually bringing order out of the political chaos produced by the war.

Governor Holden, of whom we give a portrait on page 397, was born in Orange County, North Carolina, November 24, 1818. Born of humble parents, he had no early opportunities for education. When eleven years old he was placed in a printing office. Afterward at Hillsborough he was employed as clerk in a store. He was eighteen when he went to Raleigh and undertook the duties of gentleman's boy in the office. He also worked for some time in the Register office. Here making use of every opportunity for study, he acquired a fair English education of law—a profession which he practiced for two years. In 1842 he began to edit the Standard paper, which in his hands became the most influential paper in the State. He was a warm advocate of universal suffrage in his State. In 1862 he was elected to the large House of the State Legislature. Mr. Holden supported Vance as candidate for Governor in 1862, but ran against him in 1864.

THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI DEPARTMENT.

General Sheridan has been assigned to the command of the Trans-Mississippi Department. General Canby has divided the Department of the Gulf into four divisions: Louisiana, with headquarters at New Orleans; Mississippi, head-quarters at Jackson; Alabama, head-quarters at Montgomery; Florida, head-quarters at Tallahassee.

General Weitzel's expedition to Texas has at length fairly got under way. The first portion of the fleet, consisting of 12 or 15 vessels, left Hampton Roads before the 10th. The other portion, which has been waiting, consists of the Star of the South, Richmond, Western Metropolis, Tennessee, C. C. Perry, J. P. Jackson, Evening City, Delaware Barker, Cambria, and Lillie.

The Mississippi squadron of Admiral Porter, defending Sabine Pass, were occupied by Lieutenant Commander Washington, on the 5th inst. Galveston, Texas, occupied, on the 26th ult. The rebel troops had all evacuated before the arrival of the national forces. Most large guns and other valuable property were found in these two forts. Brownsville, Texas, was occupied by national troops on the 31st of May. It is said that the rebels, before evacuating, sold their artillery to the Mexican imperialists.

Previous reports that the rebel General Kirby Smith had left Texas and gone to Mexico are confirmed.

THE FIRE AT NASHVILLE.

A very destructive fire broke out on the morning of June 10 at Nashville, in the extensive buildings used for quarter-master and commissary stores. It is supposed to have originated from the sparks of a locomotive. One-half of the building was destroyed, involving a loss to the government of from half a million to a million of dollars. While in the wake of the Quarter-master's building were stores distributed to troops in an army of eighty thousand men for two years. The casualty of huge stone consumed was valued at upward of one million of dollars. The building was the largest in the country, being eight hundred feet long and two hundred feet deep. It was four stories and of fire-walls, which were suggested and built by General M. C. Meigs, U.S.A. His precaution saved a part of the building, five hundred feet front, was saved from destruction.

WRECK OF THE "ADMIRAL DUPONT."

The Admiral Dupont was on the 9th last. sunk by a British vessel with which she collided. Off Cape Henry on twenty or her crew were lost. Shs sailed for Fortress Monroe from New York on the 8th, and had on board a crew of thirty men and twenty sturdge passengers.

GROVER'S SAMPHIS PROCLAMATION.

On the 1st of June George N. Sanders issued an impudent proclamation, calling upon the "patriots of the South" to resist the proclamations of the President Johnson. It will not surprise those who have read the evidence implicating Sanders in the plot of infamous origin and even in the assassination of President Lincoln, to hear him reviled by the rebel sympathizers. He is spoken there of as a "traitor," he says, against taking the test-oath; but, if necessary to accomplish your purposes, swallow it. Then, said the conspirators should effect it in a bowl of hemlock." In Mr. Sanders's absence he has already been outwitted still left among the chivalrous gentlemen of the South!

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE great subject of interest in the foreign news this week is the reported union between the French Emperor and his cousin the Prince Napoleon. The occasion was the Prince's marriage with the Princess CLOTILDE, the Emperor addressed to his cousin the following letter:

"MONSIEUR MON COUSIN,—I do not refrain from informing you of the painful impression I have experienced on reading your letter to Count ARESE. Before leaving my absence, with the Empress and my son, as Vice-President of the Privy Council, I must be able to be proof of my friendship and my confidence, and I hoped that your presence, your counsel, and your influence would testify to the union which reigns in our family. But the political arrangements which you have made under the title of Empress can only serve the enemies of my government. To judge of your conduct, I have to ask advice from political motives which belong no longer to our duty. To apply the ideas of the Emperor to the personal ties I have proposed to have passed through the stern trials of responsibility and power. And, above, are we not duty compelled to take care, of appreciating at its just value the grand, historical figure of Napoleon I.? As in standing before a statue outside we are unable to view the whole at once, we only see parts of it and we judge only of latter by momentary errors of the reproduction and the divergence of opinions. But when it came to the eyes of every one, in the general anarchy in men's minds—that formidable enemy of true liberty—that has been established, first in the family and afterward in his government, that severe discipline which shields the throne with will and one another, do not henceforth deviate from the same rule of conduct. Wherefore, Monsieur mon cousin, I pray you to receive the assurance of my affectionate sentiments.

NAPOLEON."

To which the Prince replied as follows:

"SIRE,—In consequence of your Majesty's letter of May 22, and its publication in the Moniteur of this morning, I resign the Vice-Presidency of the Privy Council, and also the Presidency of the Universal Exhibition of 1867.

"I accept, Sire, the homage of the profound and respectful attachment with which I am, of your Majesty, the most devoted cousin, NAPOLEON (JEROME).

"PALAIS ROYAL, May 27, 1865."

The Prince, astounded at his cousin's displeasure, has published the Ajaccio speech as a pamphlet.

The French Government has prohibited the proposed presentation of a medal to Mrs. Lincoln.

It is said that Queen Victoria and the Princess of Wales was safely delivered of a son.

SHERIDAN AND HIS GENERALS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, AND PUBLISHED BY PHILP & SOLOMONS, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

OUR LIEUTENANT-GENERALS.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT visited the Military Academy at West Point on the 8th of June. There were many interesting incidents connected with this visit; but that which was the most moving of all was the interview between Generals GRANT and SCOTT at the COZZENS Hotel. The visit to General SCOTT took place at one o'clock P.M. The Lieutenant-General had spent two hours in the library of the Academy, where he had been receiving congratulations and making young ladies happy with a shake of the hand or an autograph. But now the hundreds before him were of a different sort. General SCOTT, to give the hero a fitting reception, had attired himself in a handsome dress coat of dark yellow silk lapels and golden buttons. The rest of his dress was that of a citizen, except that his white Marseilles vest was buttoned with the regulation eagle.

General GRANT alighted from his carriage and seized the hand of General SCOTT.

"General SCOTT," said he, "I bid you all good wishes. I am pleased to see you well."

"And you, General," replied SCOTT, "I thank God that you have passed through so much peril and glory unharmed. Welcome to my bachelor home!"

Then the two officers, arm in arm, entered the drawing-room of the hotel. Here the younger, as the guest of the older, partook of a hospitality as past, conversing with the veteran hero, giving and receiving honor. At the close of the interview General GRANT returned in his carriage to West Point.

This interview will be recorded in history as a very memorable event. General SCOTT was a native of Virginia, and was born near Petersburg—the scene of GRANT'S final victories. In the meeting between these two the past joined hands with the Present: the unostentatious, earnest young hero of the West hailed the more stately Virginian veteran; victory over treason greeted back to and joined hands with victory over the alien foes of the Republic.

GOVERNOR W. W. HOLDEN.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S policy in regard to the State of North Carolina is an indication of his general policy of reconstruction, and is therefore worthy of the most careful attention. The President takes the ground that the rebellion has deprived the people of North Carolina of all civil government, and as the United States Government is under a solemn constitutional obligation to guarantee every State a republican form of government, he therefore appoints a Provisional Governor whose duty it shall be, at the earliest period, to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention, composed of delegates to be chosen by the loyal people of the State. In order to become either an elector or a mem ber of this convention the subscription to the amn esty oath is necessary. This oath binds those taking it to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, the union of the States, and all the laws and proclamations made during the rebellion in relation to the emancipation of slaves.

The person chosen by the President as Provisional Governor of North Carolina is WILLIAM W. HOLDEN, previously known as the editor of the Raleigh Progress. Most important is the office to which Mr. HOLDEN has been assigned. It is one with many difficulties. The State of North Carolina appears to be rent with factions, and Mr. HOLDEN will find that many of these are hostile to him. His course must be firm or his administration will prove a failure. It is evident, however, that the President JOHNSON has confidence in Mr. HOLDER'S ability to meet the emergencies of the crisis.

Like the President himself, Mr. HOLDEN has risen from among the people. His instincts are all republican. He lays the crime of the recent rebellion to the charge of the Southern aristocracy. Mr. HOLDEN'S past record is one which in many important respects is favorable. We sincerely hope that he will vindicate for himself the enviable glory of having saved his State from political traitors, and of having secured equal justice to all its citizens whether high or low, whether white or black.

HALF A MILLION OF MONEY

CHAPTER XVI.

THE ERECTHEUM.

"No, by Jove, Brandon, not a bit of a snob! As green as an Arcadian, but no more of a snob than—"

"Sir Charles Burgoyne was going to say, 'than you are;' but he changed his mind, and said, instead—

"—than Castletowers himself."

"I call any man a snob who quotes Bion and Moschus in his familiar talk," replied the other, all unconscious of his friend's hesitation. "I think the deuce is one to remember any thing about Bion and Moschus? and what right has he to make a fellow look like a fool?"

"Unfeeling, I admit," replied Sir Charles, languidly.

"I hate your learned people," said Brandon, irritably. "And I hate parvenus. Ignorant parvenus are bad enough; but learned parvenus are the worst of all. He's both—hang him!"

"Hang him, by all means!" said another young man, approaching the window at which the two were standing. "May I ask who he is, and what he has done?"

It was one of the princely reading-rooms of the Erectheum Club, Pall Mall. The two first speakers were the Honorable Edward Brandon, third and youngest son of Hardcastle, Fourteenth Earl of Ipswich, and Sir Charles Burgoyne, Baronet, of the second Life Guards. There are men whom nature seems to have run up by contract, and of the Honorable Edward Brandon was one of them. He was just like one of those slight, unsubstantial, fashionable houses that spring up every day like mushrooms about Bayswater and South Kensington, and are hired under the express condition of never being drained in. He was very young, very frail, and as economically supplied with brain and muscle as a man could well be. The very smallest appreciable sign of knowledge would have broken down his understanding at any moment; and his little ornaments of manner were all in the flimsiest and most fragile style of mere stucco. He "dipped" occasionally into Bell's Life and the Court Circular. He had read half of the first volume of Soapey Sponge's Sporting Tour. He played croquet pretty well, and billiards very badly, and was saturated through and through with smoke, like a Finsbury haddock.

Sir Charles Burgoyne was a man of a very different stamp. He was essentially one of a class; but then, ethnologically speaking, his class was many degrees higher than that of Mr. Brandon. He was better built, and better furnished. He rode well; was a good shot; played a first-rate game at billiards; was gifted with a certain lazy impertinence of speech and manner that passed for wit, and was effectually kept fair of complexion and regular of feature that he was popularly known among his brother officers as the Beauty.

The last comer—short, sallow, keen-eyed, somewhat flippant in his address, and showy in his attire—was Laurence Greatorex, Esquire, only son, heir, and partner of Sir Samuel Greatorex, Knight, the well-known banker and alderman, of Lombard Street, City.

"Hang him, by all means!" said this gentleman, with charming impartiality. "Who is he? and what has he done?"

"We were speaking of the new member," replied Brandon.

"What, Crœsus Trefalden? Pshaw! the man's an outer barbarian. What social eminity has he been contaminating?"

"He's been offending Brandon's delicate sense of propriety by quoting Greek," said the Beauty.

"Good! Unpardonable offence! What shall we do to him? Muzzle him?"

"Condemn him to feed on Greek roots for the term of his natural life, like Timon of Athens," suggested the Beauty, lazily.

"He's little better than a savage, as it is," said Mr. Greatorex, with supreme scorn, waving off the shoulder.. "He knows nothing of life, and cares nothing for it either. Last Tuesday, when all the fellows were in a state for the great fight down at Barney's Croft, he sat and read Homer, as if it were the news of the day. He's an animated anachronism, and what he is, Sir Charles."

"Who the deuce is he?" ejaculated Brandon. "Where does he come from?"

"Heaven knows. His father was a black letter folio, I believe, and his mother a palimpsest."

"You're too witty to-day, Mr. Greatorex," observed Burgoyne.

"Then he's so offensively rich! Why, he put down a thousand yesterday for Willis's subscription. There's his name at the head of the list. Makes us look rather small—eh?"

"Confound his assurance!" broke out Brandon. "He's not been in the House more than a week. What's Willis to him, that he should give more than the oldest members of the club?"

"Well, it's a munificent donation," said the Guardsman, good-naturedly.

"Munificent! Hang his munificence! I suppose the member of a family whose ancestors off a secretary, who has served them for fifteen years, without the help of a thousand pounds from a puppy like that!"

"Your virtuous indignation, Brandon, is quite refreshing," said Burgoyné. "How long have you been here, for example, Greatorex?"

"It was in bad taste, any how," said Greatorex; "deuced bad taste. It's always the way with your nouveau riche. If the man had been wealthy all his life would have known better."

"Yourself, par exemple," retorted the Guardsman, insolently.

"Just so, Sir Charles: but then I'm not the money-market born, so hardly a case in point."

"Where did this Trefalden get his fortune?" asked Brandon. "I've heard that some fellow left it to him a hundred years ago, and that it has been accumulating ever since, but that's nonsense, of course."

"Sounds like a pecuniary version of the Sleeping Beauty," observed the baronet, parenthetically.

"I know no more than you do, Mr. Brandon," replied Greatorex. "I have heard only the common story of how this money has been lying at compound interest for a century or more, and has devolved to our pre-Adamite friend as last, bringing him as many millions as he has fingers. Some say double that sum; but ten are enough for my credulity."

"Does he bank with Sir Samuel?" asked Brandon.

"No. Our shop lies too far east for him, I suspect. He has taken his millions to Drummond's. By-the-way, Sir Charles, what have you decided upon doing with that brown mare of yours? You seemed half inclined to part from her a few days ago."

"You mean the Lady of Lyons?"

"I do."

"Sold her, Mr. Greatorex."

"Sold her, Sir Charles?"

"Yes—cab and all."

The banker turned very red, and bit his lip.

"Would it be a liberty to ask the name of the purchaser?" said he.

"Perhaps it would," replied the Guardsman, "But I don't mind telling you. It's Mr. Trefalden."

"Trefalden! Then, upon my soul, Sir Charles, it's too bad! I'm sorry to hear it, I am, indeed. I had hoped—in fact, I had expected—upon my soul, I had expected Sir Charles, that you would have given me the opportunity. Money would have been no object. I would have given a fancy price for that mare with pleasure."

"Thank you. I did not want a fancy price," replied the Guardsman, haughtily.

"Besides, if you'll excuse me, Sir Charles, I must say I don't think it was quite fair either."

"Fair," echoed Burgoyne. "Really, Mr. Greatorex, I do not apprehend your meaning."

"Well, Sir Charles, I'll explain. I spoke first and as for Crœsus Trefalden, who scarcely knows a horse from a buffalo—"

"Mr. Saxon Trefalden is the friend of Lord Castletowers," interrupted Burgoyne, still more haughtily, "and I was very happy to oblige him."

If Sir Charles Burgoyne had not been a baronet, a guardsman, and a member of the Erectheum Club, it is possible that Mr. Greatorex, of Lombard Street, would have given him the retort uncourteous; but, as matters stood, he only gave a little contemptuous look at his watch in some confusion, and prudently swallowed his annoyance.

"Oh, of course—in that case," stammered he —"Lord Castletowers being your friend, I have nothing to say. So you go down to his place in Surrey next week, by-the-by?"

"Do you?" said Burgoyne, smoothing his flaxen moustache, and looking down at the small city man with half-closed eyes.

"I hope so, since his lordship has been kind enough to invite me; but we are so deucedly busy in Lombard Street just now that—pshaw! twelve o'clock already, and I am due in the city at twenty minutes past. A moment to lose. 'I know a bank,' et cetera—but there's no wild time there for any body between twelve and three! Good-morning, Mr. Brandon. Good-morning, Sir Charles."

The baronet bent his head about a quarter of an inch, and almost before the other was out of hearing, said,

"That man is bourgeois to the tips of his fingers. Intensely familiar. Why do you tolerate him, Brandon?"

"Oh, he's not a bad fellow," replied Brandon. "He's a sort of upper footman—a snob, with the wardrobe of a tailor's assistant and the manners of a valet. You called young Trefalden a snob just now, Burgoyne; but you was a mistake. Apply the title to this little money-jobber and I won't contradict you. The fact is, Brandon, I believe really don't know what you fellows were about to admit him!"

Charley Burgoyne was a busy man—for him this was a very large and energetic speech. But the Honorable Edward Brandon only shook his head in a listless, irritable way, and repeated his former assertion.

"I tell you, Burgoyne," he said, "Greatorex isn't a bad fellow at bottom."

Sir Charles Burgoyne shrugged his shoulders and yawned.

"Oh, very well," he replied. "Have it your own way. I hate argument."

"Castletowers likes him," said the young man.

"Castletowers asks him down to Surrey, you see."

"Castletowers is too good-natured by half."

"And Vaughan knows him."

"Vaughan owes him money, and just endures him."

The Honorable Edward Brandon rubbed his head all over, looking more helpless and more irritable than before. It was a very small head, and there was very little hair on it.

"Confound him!" groaned he. "He has taken up paper of mine too. I must be civil to him."

Sir Charles Burgoyne gave utterance to a dismal whistle; thrust his hands deep down into his pockets; and said coolly,

"What else can I do?" said Brandon.

"Pay him."

"You might as well tell me to eat him!"

"Nonsense. Borrow the money from somebody else."

"I wish I could. I wish I knew whom to ask. I should be so very grateful, you know. It's only two hundred and fifty."

And the young fellow stared hard at the guardsman, who stared just as hard at the Duke of York's column on his way.

"You can't suggest any one?" he continued, after a moment.

"I, my dear fellow? Diable! I haven't an idea."

"You—couldn't manage it for me yourself, I suppose?"

Sir Charles Burgoyne took his hands from his pockets, and his hat from a neighboring peg.

"Edward Brandon," he said, impressively "I'm as poor as Saint Simeon Stylites."

"Never heard of the fellow in my life," said Brandon, peevishly. "Who is he?"

"My dear boy, your religious education has been neglected. Look for him in your Cateschism, and, when found, make a note of."

"I'll tell you what it is, Burgoyne," said Brandon, suspicious of "chaff," and, like all weak people when they are out of temper, slightly spiteful—"poor or not poor, you're a clever fellow as a horse-dealer. You understand valuing a fancy price, indeed! What's five hundred guineas if it's not a fancy price, I should like to know?"

"Mon enfant, you know nothing about it," said the Guardsman placidly.

"I know it was an awful lot too much for that mare and cab."

"The mare and cab were dirt cheap at the money."

"Cheap! cheap—when to my certain knowledge you only gave a hundred and twenty for the Lady of Lyons, and have had the best part of two seasons out of her since!"

The Beauty listened with an imperturbable smile, drew on his gloves, buttoned them, adjusted his hat, and, having done all these things with studied deliberation, replied,

"My dear Brandon, I really envy your memory. Cultivate it, my good fellow, and it will be a credit to you. An revoir."

With this he went over to the nearest glass, corrected the tie of his cravat, and sauntered toward the door. He had not reached it, however, when he paused, turned, and came back again.

By-the-by," said he, "if you're in any present difficulty, and actually want that two hundred and fifty—how do you want it?"

"Oh, by Jove, don't I! Never wanted it so much in my life."

"Well, then, there's Trefalden. He's as rich as the Bank of England, and flings his money about like water. Ask him, Brandon. He'll be sure to lend it to you. Ta, ta!"

And the baronet once more turned on his heel, leaving his irritable young friend to swear off his indignation as best he could. Whereupon the Honorable Edward Brandon, addressing himself apparently to the Duke of York upon his column, and in a voice with "blood" in every fractionable fluency; rubbed his head frantically, till he looked like an electrical doll; and finally took himself to the billiard room.

When they were both gone, a gentleman who had been sitting in the adjoining window, intently buried, and apparently absorbed, in the Times of the day, laid his paper aside; entered a couple of names in his pocket-book, and quietly left the room; and then left the room. He paused on his way out to speak to the hall porter.

"I have waited for Mr. Trefalden," he said, "till I can wait no longer. You are sure he has not left cards?"

"Quite sure, Sir."

"So so good, then, as to give him this card, and say, if you please, that I will call upon him at his chambers to-morrow."

The porter laid the card aside with the new member's letters, of which there were several. It bore the name of William Trefalden.

CHAPTER XVII.

SAXON AT HOME.

"MRS. TREFALDEN!"

This announced by a stately valet, who received his name with marked condescension in the ante-chamber, and even deigned to open the door of the reception-room beyond, Mr. Trefalden paused on his cousin's presence. He was not alone. Lord Castletowers and Sir Charles Burgoyne were there; Lord Castletowers leaning familiarly over the back of Saxon's chair, dictating the words of a letter which Saxon was writing; Sir Charles Burgoyne extended at full length on a sofa, smoking a cigarette with his eyes closed. Both visitors were obviously at home, and at ease as if in their own chambers. They had been breakfasting with Saxon, and the table was yet loaded with pâtés, coffee, liqueurs, and all the luxurious et cetras of a second déjeuner.

Saxon flung away his pen, sprang forward, seized his cousin by both hands, and poured forth a torrent of greetings.

"How good of you to come," he exclaimed, "after having taken the trouble to call yesterday to the club! I was so sorry to miss you! I meant to hunt you up this very afternoon in Grosvenor Lane. I have had an unexpected fellow not to do so a week ago, and I'm sure I don't know how to excuse myself. I've thought of you, though, many times, every day."

"I should have been sorry to bring you into the dingy atmosphere of the City," said Mr. Trefalden, pleasantly. "I had rather see you thus, enjoying the good things which the gods have provided for you."

And with this Mr. Trefalden shook hands with Lord Castletowers, hoped Lady Castletowers was well, and bowed to Sir Charles Burgoyne, and dropped into an easy-chair.

"You were writing," he said, "when I came in. Pray go on."

Saxon blushed scarlet.

"Oh no," he said, shyly, "the letters can wait."

"So can I—and smoke a cigar in the mean while."

"They—that is, Lord Castletowers was help ing me to write them—telling me what to say, in fact. He calls me 'The Impolite Letter Writer,' you know. I must learn to turn fine phrases, and say the elegant things that nobody means."

"The things that nobody means are the things that every body likes," said the Earl.

"I have often wished," said Burgoyne, from the sofa, "that some clever person would write a hand-book of civil speeches—a sort of 'Ready Line,' you know, or 'Perjurer's Companion.' It would save a fellow so much trouble!"

"I wish there were such a book, if only to teach you better manners," retorted Castletowers.

"I don't pretend to have the manners of a lord," replied Burgoyne, lazily, laughing.

"If you were the lord of my manors, you wouldn't have many to boast of," replied Castletowers, with his usual bluntness.

Burgoyne opened his eyes and took the cigarette from his mouth.

"Listen to this fellow!" said he, "this bloated capitalist, who talks like a Diogenes turned out of his tub! Castletowers, I am ashamed of you."

"Compare me to Diogenes, if you like," replied the Earl; "but to a Diogenes who has a dear old Elizabethan tub still left, thank Heaven! and a few old oaks to shelter it. Few enough and old enough, more's the pity!"

"And I," said Burgoyne, with a yawn, "haven't a stick of timber left, barring my genealogical tree. My last oaks vanished in the last Derby."

The Earl looked at his watch.

"If this note is to be delivered by two o'clock," said he, "it must be finished at once; and since Mr. Trefalden gives us leave—"

"I do not only give leave," said Mr. Trefalden. "I entreat."

Saxon took up his pen, and, pointing to a heap of notes on the mantle-shelf, said:

"You will find one there for yourself," cousin William; and you must be sure to come."

"Invitations, young man?"

"Yes, to a dinner at Richmond, next Saturday."

Mr. Trefalden put the note in his pocket unopened; smoked away with a quiet, meditative smile; and took a leisurely survey of the room as the dictation proceeded. Not one of its multitudinous details escaped him—not one but told him some secrets of the last ten days of Saxon's new life. There were several pictures standing about on chairs, or leaning against the walls. Some were painted in oils and some in water colors, and nearly all were views in Switzerland. There were piles of new music; stacks of costly books in rich bindings; boxes of cigars and gloves; a bust of Shakspeare in marble; a harmonium, a cabinet of Florentine mosaic-work; a magnificent Erroneus vase on a pedestal of verde antico; a couple of silver-mounted rifles; a side-board loaded with nick-nacks in carved ivory, crystal, silver filagree, and eggshell china; and a sofa-table heaped with notes, visiting cards, loose silver, and unopened bills. On the chimney-piece stood a pair of bronze vazzas, a silver inkstand with a little Cupid perched upon the lid, and a gilded model of the Parthenon. A gold-headed riding-whip and a pair of foils lay on the top of the harmonium, and a field of bouquet in a tumbler occupied a bracket, from which a French pendule had been ignominiously displaced. William Trefalden was an observant man, and drew his inferences from these trifles. He found out that his young Arcadian was learning to ride, fence, make acquaintances, and spend his money royally. Above all, he took note of the bouquet on the bracket. There was nothing remarkable about it. It was just like five hundred other bouquets that one sees in the course of a season: and yet Mr. Trefalden looked at it more than once, and smiled under the cover of a cloud of smoke each time that he did so.

"—and that you will permit me to have the great pleasure of driving you down to the race-course," said Lord Castletowers, dictating over Saxon's shoulder.

"Drive her down!" echoed the scribe, in disgust. "I drive her from London to Richmond?"

"Of course. Why not?"

"I can't. I don't drive well enough. I have never driven anything but an old kitchen chair in a rickety Swiss chaezete, in my life. I should break her neck and my own too!"

"Oh, never mind. You can give the reins to Burgoyne or to me. It doesn't matter."

"Then how shall I put it? Shall I say 'and that you will permit Lord Castletowers to have the pleasure of—'"

"Nonsense! Write what I told you at first, and leave me to arrange it when it comes to the point."

Saxon shook his head.

"No, my lord," said he. "I must not ask to be allowed the pleasure of driving her down when I know all the time I am not going to do any thing of the sort. I wouldn't be true."

A faint blush mounted to the Earl's honest brow; but Sir Charles Burgoyne smiled compassionately.

"Suppose, now," said Saxon, "that I tell her I've bought a new mail phaeton, and hope she will accept a seat in it on the Saturday—will I do?"

"Famously. She'll of course conclude that you drive, and the rest is easily managed when the time comes. Let's see how it reads—hum —'asked if you will honor with your presence: also that you will permit me to offer you a seat in my mail phaeton, if the day be fine enough for my friend to drive out in open carriage.'"

"Open carriage," repeated Saxon, as his pen traveled to the end of the sentence. "Any thing more?"

"No; I think that is enough."

"Then I only add—'yours very truly, Saxon Trefalden, Esquire?'"

"Heaven forbid!"

"Isn't it polite enough?" asked Saxon, laughing.

"Polite enough! Didn't I tell you half an hour ago that to be commonly polite is nothing in a case like this? You must approach her on your knees, my dear fellow, and offer up your little Richmond dinner as if it were a burnt sacrifice to the immortal gods! Say—'Condescend, maiden, to accept my respectful homage, and allow me to subscribe myself, with the profoundest admiration, your obedient and faithful servant, Saxon Trefalden.' That's the way to put it, Burgoyne?"

"Oh, unquestionably," yawned that gentleman. "You can't crowd too much sail."

"Mrs Hungerford to which Princess of the Blood Royal this letter is addressed?" asked Mr. Trefalden.

"To a far greater She than any princess," replied Castletowers. "To the prima donna of the season—to the Graziana herself!"

Mr. Trefalden slightly elevated his eyebrows on receiving this tremendous information, but said nothing.

"And she's the grandest creature!" ejaculated Saxon, now folding and sealing his note. "Burgoyne introduced me to her last night, behind the scenes. You can't think what a gracious manner she has, cousin William!"

"Really?"

"She gave me that bouquet up there—it had just been thrown to her."

"How condescending!"

"Wasn't it? And I such an utter stranger—I nobody, you know! And I assure you, as if I were in the presence of Juno herself. There, the note's quite ready."

And Saxon, all unconscious of the faint touch of sarcasm in his cousin's voice, lifted up his bright young face with a smile of boyish exultation and rang the bell.

Gillingwater, send Curtis at once with this note, and tell him to wait for an answer. Any body here?"

Young man from Facet and Carat's, Sir, with case of jules. Young man from Carriage and Trigger's, with sions. Young man from Colnaghi's; passle from Breidenback's; passle from Fortnum and Mason's; passle from Crummel and Healy's," replied the solemn man in black.

"The parcels can wait. The messengers may come in?"

Mr. Gillingwater retired, and the "young men" were immediately ushered in; one with a small mahogany box under his arm, the other carrying a still smaller morocco case. The first contained a brace of costly inlaid pistols; the second, three bracelets of different designs.

"Look here, Burgoyne!" exclaimed Castletowers. "Look here, Burgoyne, did you ever see such fresh fun?"

"Never. They might be worn by the sultan."

"They are exact fac-similes of those made for His Highness the Maharajah of Jubbilpore," observed the messenger.

Sir Charles examined the weapons with the interest of a connoisseur.

"What a Bashaw you are, Trefalden!" he said. "We shall have you cantering down Rotten Row on a white elephant one of these days. These are really the most gorgeous pistols I have seen. Who are the bangles for? The Graziana?"

"One of them, if—

"If what?"

"If you think she would not be offended."

"Offended, my dear fellow! I am quite offended if you offer her a cup of milk? or Carlo, if you present him with a bone?"

"What do you say?" said Saxon, quite shocked at the levity of these comparisons.

"I mean that every woman would sell her soul for a bracelet of diamonds and an ounce of wrought gold, and that our fair friend is no exception to the rule. What put it into your head, Trefalden, to give her a present?"

"It was Mr. Greatorex's idea."

"Humph! Just like him. Greatorex has such generous notions of other people's expense!"

"I was very much obliged to him for thinking of it," said Saxon, somewhat warmly. "As I am to have my friend who is kind enough to tell me what the customs of society are," he added, more gently.

"They are very beautiful bracelets, all three of them," said Lord Castletowers.

"That's one to me, I take it, Blake?"

"The garter set with rubies," said Sir Charles Burgoyne.

"The snake with the diamond head," said the Earl.

"The opals and diamonds," said William Trefalden.

Saxon laughed, and shook his head.

If you each give me different advice," said he, "what am I to do?"

"Choose for yourself," replied his cousin.

And so Saxon, very diffidently and hesitatingly chose for himself, and took the one his cousin had preferred.

"And pray what may be the cost of this magnificent trifle?" asked Mr. Trefalden, when the choice was made, and the messengers had made their bows and vanished.

"I have not asked," replied Saxon.

"Do you mean that you have bought it without having made any inquiry as to its price?"

"Of course."

"Pray do you never inquire before you purchase?"

"Never. Why do you smile?"

"Because I fear your tradesmen will charge you at any figure that they please."

"Why, so they could in any case? What do I know, for instance, of opals, and diamonds, except that the opal is a pretty stone, and that the diamond a compound of charcoal and oxygen? They might ask me what price they pleased for that bracelet, and I, in my ignorance of its value, should buy it just the same."

"It is well for you, Trefalden, that you have the purse of Fortunatus to dip your hand into," said Sir Charles Burgoyne.

"But even Fortunatus must take care that his purse has a hole in the bottom of it," added Mr. Trefalden. "You are a bad financier, my dear Saxon; and you and I must have a little practical conversation some day on these matters. By-the-way, I have really some business points to discuss with you. When can you give up an hour or two to pure and unmixed boredom?"

"When you please, cousin William."

"Well—this evening?"

"This evening, unfortunately, I have promised to dine at the city Greatorexes, and two or three others, and we are going afterward to the opera."

"To-morrow evening, then?"

"And to-morrow my new phaeton is coming here, and we are going in it to Blackwell—Lord Castletowers and Sir Charles Burgoyne, I mean."

"Then, on Saturday—"

"On Saturday, I hope you will join us at Richmond. Don't forget it, cousin William. You have the note, you know, in your pocket."

Mr. Trefalden smiled somewhat gravely.

"Any one already such an epicurean that you want the traditional turbot at your feast?" said he.

"No, no, Saxon. I am a man of business, and have no leisure for such symposia. You must dispense with my grim presence—and I, apparently, must dispense with yours. I shall be at home all the week, such a man of fashion as to have all your evenings engaged in this manner."

"I can't think how it is," replied Saxon, in some confusion. "I certainly have made more appointments than I was aware of. My friends are so kind to me, and are always doing things to give me pleasure, that—shall Sunday do, cousin William? You might come up here and dine with me; or we might—"

"I am always engaged on Sundays," said Mr. Trefalden, dryly.

"Then on Monday?"

"Yes, I can see you on Monday, if you will really be at leisure."

"Of course. I will be at leisure."

"But you must come to me. I shall be very busy, and can only see you after office hours."

"I will come, certainly, at any time you please," said Saxon, earnestly.

"At eight in the evening?"

"At eight."

Mr. Trefalden entered the hour and date in his pocket-book, and rose to take his leave.

"I had hoped to have had a spare me a day or two next week, Mr. Trefalden," said Lord Castletowers, as they shook hands at parting. "Your cousin has promised to come down, and we have some private theatricals coming off; and a few more country air would do you good before the summer sets in."

But Mr. Trefalden shook his head.

"I cannot, Lord Castletowers," he replied "but it is impossible. I am as firmly chained to Chancery Lane for the next few months as any galley-slave in Turkey."

"But, my dear Sir, is it worth any man's while to be a galley-slave if he can help it?" asked the Earl.

"Perhaps. It depends on the motive; and self-imposed chains are never very heavy to the wearer."

And with this Mr. Trefalden bowed to both gentlemen, and left the room, followed by his cousin.

"That's a quiet, deep fellow," said Burgoyne, lazily.

"He is a very gentlemanly, pleasant, clever man," replied the Earl, "and has been our solicitor for years."

"I don't like him."

"You don't know him."

"True—do you?"

Lord Castletowers hesitated.

"Well, upon my soul," laughed he, "I can not say that I do, personally. But as I tell you, he is my solicitor, and I like him. I only speak from my impressions."

"And I from mine. He is not my solicitor, and I don't like him. He thinks too much, and says too little."

In the mean while, Saxon was warmly shaking his cousin's hand at the door of the anteroom, and saying, in a low, earnest tone,

"Indeed you must not suppose I have become a man of fashion, my dear cousin. cousin William; or that I would not rather—far rather—spend an evening with you than at any of those in the places. I am so very sorry I can not come to you before Monday."

"Monday will be quite soon enough, my dear Saxon," replied Mr. Trefalden, kindly; "and I am glad to see you so well amused. At eight o'clock then?"

"Yes, at eight. You will see how punctual I shall be—and you must give me some good advices, cousin William, and always tell me of my faults—won't you?"

"Humph! That will depend on circumstances and opportunity," said he while, don't buy any more diamond bracelets without first inquiring the price."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

A MODERN MIRACLE.—The Pargolis, of Milan, publishes an explanation of the miracle of the statue of the Virgin Mary, which stands in one of the most popular suburbs of that city, and which has been for the last month at all times to time on account of the ingleties of the day. The authorities have discovered that the statue, which is found to be examined, discovered in its interior a reservoir for water, intended to be heated. Whenever the clergy wished to make the Magdalen weep they had a fire lighted beneath the reservoir, which caused the water to evaporate and rise into the upper parts of the statue, and the steam there being condensed, was directed toward the eyes by means of pipes.

FORDHOOK TOBACCO.—If lobacco have now intervened between the devotee, the Bible and the Prayer-book, as King James the First's "Counterblast" is scarcely worth notice, besides, that the Fordhook bore sign, he would not have thrown stones at tobacco nor at any thing else. Snuffing was the fashion when James wrote, and seems to have excited the greatest aversion. The Sultan Mohammed the Fourth, who reigned in the world, prohibited it in his dominions under pain of death. The Grand Duke of Muscovy (Russia was not then what it is now) publicly hung every wretch who was caught in the fact of snuffing. The King of Persia commuted that punishment to the milder penalty of "cutting off the snuffers' noses. James the First of England, and Christian the Fourth of Denmark, contented themselves with inflicting money fines or simple whippings. The Pope of Rome, who has a fine accommodating people who should indulge in anything at the risk of their souls, excommunicated all people who had so dirtied up their brains by taking snuff that, after death, a little black lump was all that was found remaining in their skull.

EXTRAORDINARY DISAPPEARANCE OF A HORSE.—One of the most extraordinary accidents that has been recorded for many years past took place last Friday at Tregoss Town, near the town of Tredegar, South Wales. A boy was passing along the road, when, as he was looking at a carriage inhabited by a man named Evan Jenkins and his family, he thought he observed a movement of part of the masonry. On watching it more narrowly he was satisfied that it was the mouth of the window was shaking, and being apprehensive that the foundation of the structure was giving way he ran to the house and alarmed the inmates, who had scarcely found the table at breakfast. By this time the floor began to shake, and the inmates had time immediately run into the road—and had scarcely done so when the house began to totter to its base to the ground, and in a very short time was entirely out of sight, leaving the site upon which it had stood and the chairs and table within some inches of the road with earth and stones which had fallen from the back part of the house. It would seem that as soon as the cottage was raised stood over a disused colliery, and the earth in the vicinity of the house had given way for a hundred feet below the surface. The escape of the family was almost upon a par with miracles, as the whole of their furniture, and, indeed, every thing contained in their humble dwelling, was carried into the mine beneath them.

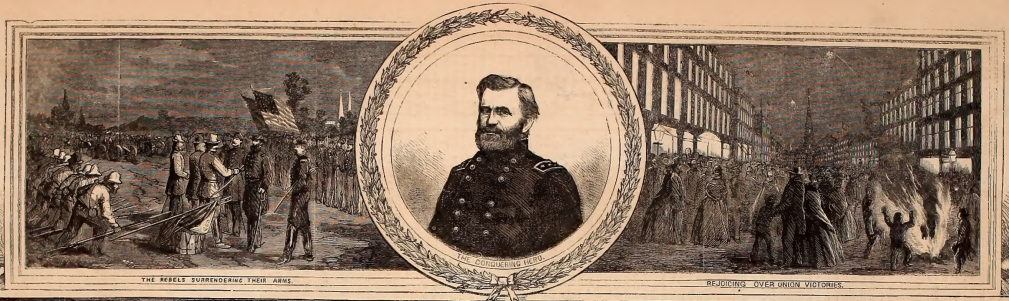
HOW TO BEGIN TO STUDY.—"Take nothing for granted" is a good motto for beginners. Take nothing for granted which you can prove for yourself. It may be, or it may not. Investigate, examine, discuss, analyze, and then rest until you have proved the point. Do not consume time in the present, but will save time in the future. Seek your nature rather than books, and things rather than words. Observe trifles, for nothing is so trifling as to be without importance. Cultivate a habit of making notes of your observations. Keep up a good resolution, and walk in the light of it; and work hard in the present, and already you will have learned "How to begin!"

A ROMANTIC SUICIDE.—A incident from disappointment in love was recently consulted by a young woman considered as shopwoman in a shop in the Rue de Rivoli, Paris. Before leaving to go and consult, with which she had put an end to her existence, she had decorated her room with flowers, and had written a letter to her friends. When found she was lying on her bed, her hands folded on her breast, and her countenance having a look so peaceful that she might have been supposed to be sleeping. She had taken a dose of the poisonous alkaloid called morphine, and stating the motive which had prompted her suicide.

IT is a tolerably well known that the favorite sheets of many provincial English newspapers are manufactured in the metropolis, on a charge of so much per hundred—the name of the paper being changed to suit the local requirements of different titles, and figuring in Whig and Tory journals with the same impartiality. The manufacture is a branch of a trade meritorious of jokes and poetry, which took its name from the paper-making materials. The paper-maker of our day does not use the rag of the mummy-case, but he does use what does: but the last novelty, it appears, is that started by the Belfast Whig, which has offers under good columns of sales for newspapers and other serials at 3s. per foot—according to the Belfast Whig's measurement.

PETROLEUM AS FUEL.—Petroleum has been used as a fuel by the French, Norwegians, and people round the Caspian Sea, in a crude state, mixed with the decomposing vegetable and animal oils. The lamps of every country in the world are now supplied to the west of it. Some believe that the time which cremated the towns of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain were smeared with it, and it is found in the Dead Sea when those towns and Gomorrah. In Trinidad there is a lake of pure petroleum, and it is also found in Sicily, Italy, Germany, and England.

FIRES IN BEDROOMS.—Most people, even many intelligent ones, have the idea that to sleep in a cold room is good—essential to health. It is an error. To sleep in a room is pure fire in your bedroom. The atmosphere is not only by this means rendered unhealthy, but with the fire you will keep the window open, which will add greatly to the needful warmth. But most people who sit with the fire you will have fewer bed-clothes over you, which is a gain, as here another fruitful source of bad air arises somewhat with the circulation and respiration, but prevents the escape of vitiated air through the fire and constantly emitting. Even furnace or stove heat with an open window is better than a close, cold room.



A POPULATION COLUMN.—For the benefit of those who are interested in statistics, education, war, pestilence, famine, etc., it may be as well to mention that the census of the United States, taking at the end of the hundredth generation, commencing from the beginning of the world, and the population can go 30 years, and allowing for each man, woman, and child an average increase of four per cent. per annum, the census would form a vertical column, having for its base the world's surface, five miles square, and terminating in a plain, and for its height 3674 times the sun's distance from the earth. The number of persons in the vertical column on the other would amount to 460,700,000,000,000.

WHAT IS TO THINK ABOUT.—The importance of ventilating bedrooms is a fact which every body is vividly interested in, and which few people appreciate. If two persons are to occupy a bedroom during a night, let them step on the weighing scales as they retire, and then again in the morning, and they will find that they each weigh a pound and a half heavier in the morning. Frequently there will be a loss of two or more pounds, and we have known persons about the year will be a loss of one pound. That is, during the night there is a loss of a pound of matter, which has passed off from every one of them, and from the lungs and partly through the pores of the skin. It is a most unhealthy bedroom which can not descend animal matter or poisonous exhalations.

DON'T JUMP TO A CONCLUSION.—M. de Fonvielle, the well-known writer of "Les Terres Inconnues," has been living in the streets of Algiers, and observing the young Bedouins of the Arab Colonies who were out for walking exercise, built before a bookseller's shop and took up a book. He was curious to see how far the children of the desert would buy. His astonishment was great when he found every one of them purchasers of half-penny prints published in Paris called the Petit Journal, the editor of which pulls the strings of the "Timothy Trim." How marvelous, said he, are the ways of Providence! Who would have imagined that Timothy Trim was destined to be the agent of civilization for the regeneration of the Arab race and the conversion of Mussulmans with a taste for French literature! Hod M. Timothy Trim, who never wrote a line that was worth reading, dates, and raises; and it was to wrap up these delicious fruits that the Parisian grocers first used and provided themselves with M. Timothy Trim's journal.

IN fashionable circles a good deal of amusement is created by the use of what is called "confessional" albums, under the old-fashioned album, which had got to be such a horrid bore. In one of these volumes is put, you, under "Confessional," containing a series of questions to which each person to whom an answer. The book then lifted gives your friends a considerable amount of amusement. The questions are of the most varied character. Such as, what your favorite qualities in man; ditto in woman; your favorite occupation; your favorite amusement; your chief favorite heroes in real life; your favorite heroines in real life; your favorite heroes in fiction; your favorite heroines in fiction; your favorite food and drink; your favorite names; your pet aversions; what characters in history you most dislike; what your present state of mind is; for what fault you have most relentless; your favorite music. Of course, a little flattery is allowable and expected. If you are asked what you would like to live, while the promise writes on "a great scale," the gay savoir "refine," and by the time he has done with the ladies, he puts to the question of your idea of happiness, he replies, "to look at you!" or gives the lady's name, which asked for a favorite name.

THE SEASONS OF LOVE.

THE Spring of Love has its own delight;
When blossoms and sun together
Bring leaves and grasses and posies bright,
But 'tis marked by fickle weather.

The Summer of Love: I know its heat,
Its passion, its glow, its glory,
When the blood is warm, and the pulse's beat
Marks time to a musical story.
But people languish beneath the rays
That burn too fierce, too fond;
Though June brings roses and balmy days,
There are August days beyond.

The Autumn of Love, I used to vow,
Was the fairest love of all;
When the ripe fruit comes, with its cheeks aglow
And the leaves downward fall.
The dead leaves fall, but the evergreen wreaths
Are beautiful still in their pride;
This love seems loyal—this ripe love breathes
Of a faith and truth which abide.

But the Winter of Love is the choice of all!
Oh, the Winter of Love give me!
When dear ones gather in parlor and hall,
All under your own roof-tree.
The Winter of Love is the love, I ween,
That speaks of a spirit rare:
The white pine stands in its kinglicst green
When the forest around is bare.

Then firesides glow and lamps burn bright,
And the cold world's shut away!
Oh, Winter of Love, with your pure delight,
You have passed the time of decay!
You have passed the Autumn of Love—and live!
Emily! the best you bring:
The only change that the world can give
Is the change for Endless Spring.

HOW HARE BECAME A PARSON.

I.

I was living with my aunt, Mrs. Osborne, who was a widow in very independent circumstances and my father's only sister. At that time she resided at a house called Black-water Lodge, on the river of the same name, and that was situated just outside, little more than a mile distant from, the romantic and busy town of M——, in the south of Ireland.

Our household at the lodge, at the date on which I refer, consisted of the house-maid, Susan, a rich cellent, good young woman, who was held in great esteem by my aunt, and was a special favorite of mine; the cook, Mrs. Gwynne, an old and faithful follower of the family; with Parks, the black, who had come to us from abroad, and with whom, while my nurse returned to India, readily consented to engage in my aunt's service, and very soon settled down into the position of domestic.

I can not say for myself that I ever cared very much for Parks; as a child, I know, I delighted to him a sore trial of my hands through his wool curls, and try to pull out the hairs, and often compelled him to submit to sundry ablutions on his face to see if I could at all wash him white. As I passed into riper years I someway got to dislike Parks. His manner, though always respectful, was often moody and repellant; and probably Susan the house-maid's positive hatred of him, which she took no trouble to conceal, may have strengthened the feeling. One unfavorable phase of his character Susan constantly harped on—his extreme closeness.

"The old black screw; he'd boil his mother to make candles of the tallow!" she would say.

His wages were very liberal, and I know were drawn to the day, and lodged in the bank, for I had heard aunt remark on this habit; and the house-maid often dwelt with irritation on all he'd squeeze out of his monthly allowance, and the meanness of his ways, she said, to save a half-penny. We had one other servant, an outside man, who did up the horses, had to do with turf and kindling, and occasionally worked in the garden, with a helper under him.

About the period of which I write, when I was just seventeen years of age, my aunt was terribly disturbed; indeed the whole south of Ireland was in a flame of excitement. The Whiteboys, as they were called with us, elsewhere the Defenders, were enrolled and organized in alarming numbers. I remember seeing some of them, on light nights, from the upper windows, with white bands round their hats, that gave them the appearance of a troop of mourners at a funeral, marching with military precision along a valley not far distant, and filing off to a small wood, where they were in the habit of holding their nightly rendezvous. Of course, upon neighboring mansions we continually heard; but as in every instance these were for arms, and only attempts of the such were known to be, we felt more examinatity than might have been supposed, considering there was so much of disturbance around us.

"Sure every body knows that we don't keep a pop-gun in the house," aunt would say, "and what need we mind it?"

She never allowed even a servant to have firearms of any kind, declaring that she thought it the safest way. We had, to be sure, such precautions taken as at the period were universally adopted—strong bars to the doors outside to all the lower windows, and so close that a Parks observed, "a mouse couldn't get in or out," and those gave our habitation very much the appearance of a jail; and, besides, new and more substantial internal fastenings were procured for the back and front doors; and to these Aunt Osborne triumphantly printed when remonstrated with on our lonely position, and reminded, moreover, that she was well known to be wealthy, and possessed of a large quantity of plate and jewels of great value, and that in these troubled days desperadoes of every description were going about in plenty, so that an attack upon us, even though we had no fire-arms to attract the cupidity of the rebels, might nevertheless be by no means an improbable thing. Once or twice aunt thought of lodging the plate and other valuables in the bank until the present storm blew over, but was always dissuaded by Parks, who maintained that "there was no fear in the world for, indeed, did we ourselves entertain the least.

One day I well remember. Mrs. Osborne had gone out to pay a distant visit, and would not be back, she told me, till late. Parks, of course, had driven the carriage. Mrs. Gwynne, however, was at the time in the hospital of the town, slowly recovering from a long and severe attack of fever. Susan had undertaken to do all the cooking during the cook's illness, so as to obviate the necessity of any temporary hand being employed, as my aunt disliked new people about her in the servant line, so that the housemaid and myself were the only occupants of the house. I had a very bad cold, and was invited to occupy my aunt's room. I otherwise should. It was near the end of the day—a dull, gloomy one in the month of November. I was studying close to the window, reading, trying to catch the last remnant of the waning light, and deeply absorbed in my book. A shadow suddenly fell from my page. It was a dark shadow from outside quite blocking up the window. I gazed in terror, and saw a man on the ground-floor just outside the casement in earnestly in. All the front windows were low, reaching to the ground. The look appeared to be full of evil intent, and fearful, and wi h difficulty suppressed a scream. He made a motion to me with his hand, put his finger on his lip to intimate silence, and then beckoned to me, implying that he wished me to go to it. On a closer scrutiny I recognized, to my surprise, the Roman Catholic priest of the parish, whom I had several times met upon the road, and who always seemed very civil. I had heard too that he was a most greatly loved by the poor of the parish. Some what reassured, yet still nervous and excited, and curious to know the object of this unusual and late call, I hastened to the door and opened it at his sign. When I opened it he seemed disappointed, as in the dusky twilight he had evidently mistaken me for my aunt.

"Is Mrs. Osborne in?" he asked, in a low, hurried voice.

"No, Sir," I replied; "but I am expecting her every moment."

"Indeed!" And then he stood on the step as if in thought for a minute. "Who else is in the house?" he asked, abruptly.

No one just now," I said, "but Susan the housemaid, Mrs. Gwynne is in hospital."

"Yes, I know she is; just as well, perhaps. Look, young lady, I have something to write on paper and I'll write the message I want to leave for Mrs. Osborne, and be quick, please."

"Yes, Sir," I replied, "I will be quick." I'll get it for you," and he followed me into the sitting-room. A sheet of letter-paper was lying on the table.

"Here, this will do," and he took it up, and tearing it across, folded one half of it into the form of a note. "I have a pencil," he said; and taking a book in his hand he wrote a few lines in a hurried up to the window, and with his eye close to the paper to get the full benefit of the last gleam of light that was struggling through the dusky pane. He gave to me; he then turned round and said, in the same sharp, quick tones that he had employed from the first, "I must add a few words to my note on the bit of wax?" I supplied him at once, and twisting up the remainder of the sheet of paper into a match he lit it at the fire. "Hold this a moment, if you please." I held the burning paper for him, and as its transient glare fell upon the features while he sealed the note I observed that his usually ruddy and good-humored face had an anxious, care-worn aspect, and that he repaired pale and thin. He then looked up and caught my eye seriously fixed on him, "Take care," said he, "you'll burn your fingers," and taking the match he extinguished it between him my hand he flung it unceremoniously on the carpet, extinguishing it with the heel of his boot.

"You know who I am, my child?" he inquired.

"Yes," I replied, "Father Malachi."

"Well," said he, sinking his voice into an anxious whisper, "I've come to warn you that one of Osborne's own hand; you're sure, aunt, I believe?"

"Yes."

"And, young lady," he continued, "I'll take it as a favor if you'll not mention to any one, Susan the maid, or any one else, this visit of mine, and this Mrs. Osborne's note."

I promised him on the word of a lady that I would not.

"Thank you—good-night," and dragging his hat that he had not, during his short stay, removed at all from his head, down over his brows, and wrapping his cloak closely around him, he turned to go. Of course I round him, he strode out at the door, down the Laurel Walk, and was soon lost in the darkness. Soon I heard the sound of the carriage-wheels advancing, and I quickly threw off the timidity and hesitation I was sure was unbecoming under the circumstance, and met Aunt Osborne as if nothing had occurred. I kept the note safely, and did not tell her about it until we were alone in her room, when I then gave it, mentioning the circumstances under which it had been intrusted to me, as well as the peculiar manner of the priest with regard to the writer. My aunt seemed considerably surprised at what I told her, and hastily opened the strange missive; I noticed that she looked puzzled after she had read it, and holding the paper for several minutes in her hand, she continued gazing in silence into the fire.

"Do you know the contents of this?" she asked at length, pointing to the note.

"No," I said; "I did not see nothing about it."

She handed it to me without a word: it ran as follows:

"MADAM.—From circumstances that have lately come to my knowledge, through whom, or in what way I am not at liberty to mention, I have reason to believe that a considerable danger threatens you, and that from a quarter that you might perhaps least apprehend; you will understand that a parish priest is often bound to secrecy by the most sacred obligations, and I am almost breaking through the limits of official discretion and reserve in conveying this intimation. I therefore reckon confidently on your closest silence; act, but don't speak; lose no time in removing from your house to some safe custody the valuables that would tempt an assailant, and this may probably avert the peril; above all, let no imprudent urge betray you not to convey the faintest hint to a single soul not in your house that you have been in any way warned.

"I am your well-wisher,

"Pray burn this."

"Well," asked Aunt Osborne, "what do you think of that letter?"

"Think of it?" I exclaimed, in horror, "why, if I were you I'd go, bag and baggage, into lodgings in M——, somewhere, and I'd get every thing worth twopence into the bank, under Mr. Gregory's care. I shou'n have an easy moment here now, and the dark nights coming on."

"Oh, nonsense!" replied Mrs. Osborne, "I'm not a bit afraid of any one out here. I shall only take my jewels, and Susan, though, about lodging the plate and some other matters in the bank; only I mustn't say a word to Parks—he would be quite offended."

"What on earth," I said, "can Father Malachi mean by danger from a quarter that we don't suspect. Isn't that what he says?" and I glanced again at his note.

"Why," he means that it is the Whiteboys will attack us for money, though we haven't arms. Indeed, I heard the other day, I now remember, that Parks had purchased one or two boxes near Cork, for money alone; they want it, I suppose, to help out their shooting projects; any way, I'm not afraid of them, and I'll not be driven out of the whole matter, and whether it might not be well to have a gun or pistol, or something or other for Parks, in case any thing should happen; and bythe-way, Maggie, I promised to take Mrs. Gregory for a drive to-morrow, and said that we'd have an early dinner, so you'll remember, and be told me that he'd come home with us in the evening if we were at all afraid. I hope your cold will be well enough, and we can have a nice little dinner-party; positively it might be better to move into the town for the winter. I must take care, though, and not betray in the least that poor Father Malachi has so kindly exposed in us; I declare it was a very good thing of him to do, more than I should have expected." And so saying, she left the note into the fire.

"Why, then," I rejoined, "I'd almost wish that he had kept his letter to himself, he has terrified me finely by it."

Various conjectures and plans were expressed and discussed that evening; at one time we thought of going, like Father Malachi, the next day and questioning him more closely, but then abandoned the idea as it would be making a fuss, and be a bad return for the favor he had shown. I also succeeded in diverting my aunt from the intention she had half adopted of consulting and disclosing the purport of the priest's letter, and how it reached her, to Mr. Gregory when consulting him as to what prudent course of things in the country; and to this aunt ultimately agreed.

The next day my old cold was too heavy to think of venturing out. Aunt Osborne wanted to forego her intention of remaining to dinner; I insisted, however, on her abiding by the original arrangement, but she promised that she would be home as early as possible. She left soon after breakfast, as she wished to get to the hospital to take some things for Mrs. Gwynne, and had other places to call at before going to the Gregory's at the Bank. The earlier part of the morning I passed in dozing myself, and then settled down at my favorite seat in the window that nearly faced the Laurel Walk, over which I could see while reading on the preceding day. Susan sometimes came in to look after the fire, or to talk with me a little, as she said she was not wished to go out, as she had a number of occasions, she was stood by my chair,

"Oh! Miss Maggie," she exclaimed, "if here isn't Miss the Osborne's own nephew up the walk. No, I can't Mike," she added, as she looked out more closely, "but 'tis a peddler, any how, and I'm in such a way for want of a bit luck of my head."

Poor Susan had a regular penchant for peddlers; she'd rather buy from one of these itinerant hawkers than avail herself of a good meal, than at any shop in the town. I objected strongly to a strange man at such times being at all encouraged about the place, especially as Mrs. Osborne's absence; but the servant pleaded so hard, and said that she would not have such a bargain will be to her, that as an old shawl she had to dispose of, that I could not find it in my heart to refuse her. I insisted, however, that he should not enter the contrivance, as I would not hear of any stragglers being admitted into the back-yard or kitchen. Meanwhile, the man had advanced down the Laurel Walk towards the house; he seemed to me to be more tardy in his movements than the apparent weight of his load would have warranted me in supposing. I thought, he has traveled some great distance. As he came to the window and touched his hat civilly he looked, I thought, at me, and I sent him to the hall-door, and very soon Susan was on her knees in the hall closely examining the contents of his pack, and trying to strike a bargain for some of his goods: there was altogether a multifarious assortment, ballads, some pictures in little tawdry gilt frames, tool-laces, needles, and thread-laces, and other frivolous decorations, but little that was useful. I remained in the hall while Susan was engaged with him, partly for amusement, as well that I did not wish a stranger to be there alone with only the servant. I could not help noticing in the man a listless indifference about selling his wares, while an occasional eagerness was manifestly assumed. I first imputed this to the apathy arising from fatigue until I observed, with considerable uneasiness, a restless movement of his eyes in every direction; now to the hall-door, then to the kitchen, then toward the dining-room, again to the stairs; while, when I once asked Susan what caused such a bitter wind that surely she had not left the back-door open, and when the answered that she was obliged, the kitchen smoked so, I thought I could detect at once upon the peddler's face a look of inquisitive and excited curiosity as he said,

"Smoke, does it? Just let me look at it and I'll cure it for you."

I instantly and decidedly declined, somewhat to Susan's surprise, who would have admitted him, I doubt not, at once. I had but one desire now, to get the fellow out—in fact I inwardly trembled with apprehension until he was clean off; and at last, to my inexpressible relief, he gathered up his goods after the servant had paid for her purchases, and trudged down the walk by which he had come. We both stood in the window watching him, while more than once from time he looked back, as though to see if we were still there, when soon the turn in the avenue hid him from view. Susan remained with me for a while descanting on the disinterested excellence of the articles which she had bought. I gave little heed to her encomiums; uneasy thoughts about that man were running in my mind, and I told the house-maid that I did not at all like his way or appearance, and that I was sure I'd dream of him that night. I then kept close by the side of the day passed: I had a kind of luncheon dinner, and remained after it sitting by the fire in the twilight in a dreamy doze; for my cold was oppressive. When Susan lit the candles and drew the curtains, stirred up the fire, and made the room comfortable, I took the small candle that she had to get some work up stairs. At the top of the last flight, and near the door of my aunt's room, there was a sort of arched recess, where cloaks and other stray articles of that description were hung; and as I reached the landing I was attracted by the motion of one of these, a cloak, I believe it was. I thought, I remember, that the lobby window must be open, and that a breeze from it shook the garment. I paused to see, and then, at a loss to understand what it could be, I was about to move into the recess itself to examine more closely, when I became rooted to the spot on observing quite distinctly the outline of a figure draped in a dark, heavy wrap of Mrs. Osborne's: it seemed to me as if he must have hurriedly folded it round him, probably on hearing my step, for it was clumsily managed. One foot projected, quite distinctly, and I at once recognized a similar kind of boot that I had noticed on the peddler when in the hall in the day. I know not how I kept from instantly betraying the startling discovery by a loud scream; my heart leaped to my throat, but I gained sufficient command over myself to pass on into my room, and after a moment's delay, returning, I went down, with as little appearance of haste as I could summon, to the hall, and on my shoulder as I passed by the spot where the robber was hidden. Near the foot of the stairs I met Susan coming up. Quickly my hand on her arm I whispered,

"Come with me."

Unfortunately my pale face so alarmed her that with a loud voice she cried, "Lord! Miss Maggie, what is it?"

Instantly there was a rustling sound overhead, and a man's voice. I had not time to reply, but called, "The peddler is up stairs; run, Susan, run!" and flinging down the candle, I flew to the front-door, opened it, and with a cry that is due to my cowardice with frantic speed down the Laurel Walk to get assistance from the lodge. I had not advanced half a dozen yards before I heard the house-door with its crunching sound, on the gravel of the avenue, in, as I conjectured, rapid pursuit; this augmenting my speed, I put forth my utmost energy to the very utmost in pressing on, and I soon had the satisfaction of hearing my pursuer dart into the plantations, for the noise of his footsteps being broken and pushed aside conveyed to me this welcome assurance. Possibly, as I afterward thought, he never meant to follow me at all events at all which way I had gone, for the night was intensely dark, but may have been only concerned in effecting his escape after he had been detected. I found Brien, the gardener, at the gate lodge, and another workman with him, just putting them back as well as possible to the house, for I felt anxious about poor Susan, knowing the fright she must be in. We discovered her still in the cook's room, half dead with fear. Mrs. Osborne's arrival in the midst of our consternation was a relief to all, and nothing could equal my aunt's distress when she learned what had happened and the alarm to which we had been subjected. Even Parks looked grave and uneasy, and himself made the evening suggest the propriety of removing from the house any thing that might be a bait to plunderers. I could see that Aunt Osborne was relieved from some concern at the proposal emanating from the butler himself; she had arranged, she told me in the course of the evening, to convey all our valuables to the house of Mr. Gregory; and it was a great comfort, she said, that Parks had now advised the same, for it made all matters smooth. We both confidently felt that attempt made by this pretended peddler was what Father Malachi meant in his private warning; and, terrified as I had been by the tragic adventure of the day, I could not help secretly congratulating myself that I had succeeded, I went to bed more at ease that night, as the vague dread of the morning better had excited me now to a greatdegree set at rest; and I was further consoled by finding that my aunt was more pleased than angry with my conduct. I had for some time urged—the moving into the town for the winter months. The next day proved one of unremitting anxiety to me. We had determined during the lodgment to be made with Mr. Gregory into M—— that morning, but as well from the weather as Paul's suggestion it was deferred till the succeeding day. It would be well, he said, to give all the silver a thorough cleaning before it was laid by, and he could do that in a few hours easily.

Notwithstanding the heavy rain Parks repaired to M—— to give the authorities a description of the peddler (which he got just accurately from me and Susan), and to try and ascertain if he had any others connected with him, for he strenuously maintained that the ruffian was not single-handed in the matter, but must be one of a gang. It was midday before the butler returned, and when he did he called at once for Susan, to tell her that he had met a messenger on his way, from her home (it was about five miles distant, at the foot of a neighboring mountain), with the intelligence that her mother was dying—"A most off," he said, "Susy, she was; and that she implored you, for the love of God, to go to her, not to lose a moment, for his word was she was just on the fringe."

The announcement of this sad impending catastrophe affected the poor girl, as may be supposed, with the greatest sorrow; the house resounded with her sobs and moans. We made her up with all the coats and mantles she could wear; Parks assured her that he'd look after every thing of her work that was necessary, and with sympathetic tears Aunt Osborne and I saw her off upon her mournful errand.

For the remaining hours of daylight my aunt and Parks were busied over the different costly articles of silver that were being packed into a large chest, in preparation for their removal on the succeeding day, and we were, I think, a little later than usual at dinner in consequence. Susan scarcely dined, I know, when we were considerably startled by a loud, impetuous, and incessant knocking at the door, and we were astonished when the angry claimant for admission turned out to be Susan back again. I saw that Parks looked greatly disconcerted; and, quite agitated, on her entrance, while, without ceremony, not even retaining by the presence of, or a feeling of respect for, my aunt, she assailed him with extreme bitterness for what she termed "his sending her off in the wet upon a fool's errand. Nothing in life, master, matter will be," I met Tom, that's my brother, coming foremost me down the hill, and she never was further. She had a purpose in it, you all black thief you," she exclaimed in a rage, "I don't believe you ever met any one who told you she was ill. Come, you may as well tell me, now! What was he like? Oh, I have had a talk about you since, I can tell you; no matter;" and the aggrieved girl ended a brief paper chase that I have attempted to describe, and that no interruption or remonstrance on our part could stop, by bursting into tears.

cautiously opened Parks's countenance within this stormy scene. At first he seemed frightened, but that soon yielded to an expression of pent-up fury that terrified me by its violence; before our return I never saw any thing so fiendish. A wild gleam shot from his eyes, and they glared like a cat's in the dark; his large drops gathered on his dark forehead; his heaving chest emitted gasps like the ominous growling of an angry beast; while his set teeth were pressed down into the thick under lip until the blood came. I thought at the moment that he would have done some fearful deed on the spot. I had heard of his once before being similarly excited, and that those who witnessed it said "they wouldn't care to have a hand in aggravating blacky" but I had no idea of the reality.

Aunt Osborne insisted on Susan's going early to bed. She dined there with but little relish and cried copious prevarications, for the poor girl had been thoroughly saturated from the rain.

For a time after tea that evening we sat silently at our work in the drawing-room. I could think of nothing but the terrible face of the black. I felt that it would be painfully inquired upon me as long as I lived. I was silent, too; for at least during this day, if not before, a kind of undefined apprehension had I scarce liked to express had been creeping over me that Parks was a man not to be trusted. Now, since dinner, the vague feeling had gathered strength; a phantom, so to speak, suddenly assumed a bodily form; and yet the sickening alarm that the idea gave rise to was such that I could dismiss it from my thoughts no altogether groundless, but I could not. Even silence about it now was becoming oppressive. I looked up from my work, my dear companion at the other side of the table was at some embroidery that seemed to try her sight too much as she bent above it over it, and I noticed that a shade of trouble or anxiety disturbed that usually sweet, serene face.

"Aunt," I said, suddenly, "did you ever at all occur to you," and I hesitated, to try and shape my unpleasant thought in less unpleasant words, "that —that—Parks is not worthy of the trust you repose in him?"

"What makes you say so?" she replied, hurriedly, dropping the work from her hand and looking nervously at me.

"I can hardly tell you," I rejoined. "I don't like what I have seen for days back, and I expect something wrong; though I don't well know what, about this matter of Susan's; but what influences me most now is the awful look he had at the time at dinner that she attacked him. You did not see it, but I never can forget it; and I tell you what, aunt," I continued, "it has revived strongly on my mind more than once to-day that, in the priest's note, the covert allusion was to him."

"Well, my love, Parks being a Protestant might have biased his mind, even if he did refer to him."

"Oh, depend upon it," I rejoined, "religion one way or the other, had nothing to do with it."

My aunt seemed lost in thought for a few moments. "Very true," she said at last, with a deep sigh. "He has hitherto hindered me, I almost thought strangely, in sending away the plate. Curious, too, he drew all his money out of the bank. I heard this only yesterday, and I fancy that Mr. Gregory suspects him. To tell you the whole truth, Mabel, since I have not felt very comfortable about him myself for the last week, though till this moment I hardly allowed myself to entertain the idea, I thought. Please God, come what may, we'll be off into M—— at once."

"I wish we were safe there this very night!" I almost unconsciously ejaculated.

I had scarce expressed the wish, uttered in a low voice, when we were both suddenly terrified by the sound of a cry. It appeared to be at a distance, but had a kind of muffled or smothered tone. Whoever it was, it was like the last wild utterance of some creature in mortal anguish, and sounded fearfully in the stillness of the night.

"Oh! what's that?" said my aunt, bounding upright from my seat, so deeply fretted he was a work. We stood listening with blanched faces, but not another sound or stir reached us, and in a few moments Frisk, a small dog, gave a half growl, half bark under the window.

"Oh, there!" I said, with a deep breath of relief, "I know what it was. Frisk after a rabbit, I'll engage. I heard just such a cry, I'm sure, the other day from one that he killed in the wall; and, of course, it was more startling at this hour."

"Perhaps it was," rejoined my aunt. "It certainly seemed to be outside; but, dear, it sounded so awful!"

We remained for a while longer at our work, more quieted, though still not altogether at ease.

"Look, Maggie," said my aunt, "I want to run up for a bit of thread to finish this, and then I think we'll go to bed, for I declare I'm in a tremor since I heard that noise."

"Yes, and I must sleep with you to-night," I said, "for I should be afraid to be alone, and my room door is the only one in the house, I think, that has both lock and key. I was thinking the other day that there was not another pair above or below that one could lock themselves up in, if they required it."

"You're right, child, I believe," rejoined my aunt, laughing; "however, if we go to M——, it will not be worth while to get any thing done to them at present."

If indeed!" I said, in a kind of soliloquy, as she left the room.

I don't now know how long Aunt Osborne was absent. I was pondering so deeply upon the occurrences of the past day or two, and wondering what might be the matter, that I was not aware of her return, and did not notice her coming back into the apartment until the light of her candle fell upon the work I still held in my hand, though I had not put in a stitch for several minutes, and I turned to her with the start that I have seen a nervous person give from my chair, gazing at her, transfixed with horror. Her face was white like snow; every lip was the same; and the hand she stretched so, that only I caught her I think she would have fallen. She seemed trying to speak, but her tongue refused to utter a sound, and she fell, with my own face growing as ghastly as hers; I took the candle from her nerveless hand, and almost forced it into the seat that I had occupied.

"For mercy's sake," I whispered, "what is it; tell me; what have you seen?" I reached from the mantle a tumbler of water, and held it to her lips for some medicine that I was to take for my cold, and made her swallow two or three sups.

"Maggie!" she said, at last, gasping out, "'tis all true—Parks," and she shook from head to foot, "he's above, behind my bed; 'tis pushed a little down from the side of the wall, and I saw his face in the looking-glass, and then, for fear of a mistake—I don't know how I got courage—I looked at him directly at the back. He was peering through an opening in the back curtain, with a knife or some sharp thing in his hand. He means to murder us to-night, child. I feel it. I could not have been mistaken, to nerve myself up, though aghast at this appalling intelligence.

"Aunt, be certain," I asked—and how unnaturally hollow my whispering voice sounded!—"that he does not suspect you of having seen him?"

"No, I got strength at the moment, somehow, and walked quietly from the room; but oh, Maggie, what are we to do?"

"We must," said I, bracing myself for this fearful emergency, "first of all gently wake up Susan, and then try, all three, to escape by the door and off before he finds out that he's discovered. Where are the keys? Great goodness! they had been left outside! we then remembered that we locked every night, and left in a small basket on a table in my aunt's room.

"Stay here a bit there," she exclaimed, "and the table, you know, is just by the bed; but I forgot in my fright what it was, and all about it. Now there was no earthly hope that I could get them, even from the house; the windows are barred, the doors are locked, and the keys up close to where that fiend watch is lurking."

"I fear, indeed, dear aunt," I exclaimed, hurrying into tears, and throwing my arms round her, "that our destruction is determined. And I shook with convulsive but suppressed sobs.

"Don't, don't, my poor darling child !" said my beloved relative soothingly, more aroused and excited by the violence of my emotion. "There is One who can help us in the last extremity !" and she lifted her face with our mutual encircling one another we sank upon our knees, while Aunt Osborne uttered a few trembling but fervent words of heartfelt supplication to the almighty.

"Better," I said, "to call up poor Susan. If it comes to a last struggle, three together might do something; you'll not be afraid to stay here if I slip down to her?"

"No, dear," she answered; "you know he has no idea that we suspect any thing, and he'll be quiet too, I think."

I stole softly out, and down the stairs to the basement; the room which the housemaid occupied, and the cook with her when at my aunt's house, was in a remote part of the house, off a passage at the other side of the kitchen; while the man's apartment was at the opposite extremity of the same story. I passed quickly on, and opening the door, called out in a low tone, "Susan, Susan!" There was no reply. Going up to the bed, I said, "Susan, you erred herself up in the quilt," I muttered; "your thing, she was so tired and sleepy; how tossed, though, all the clothes are!" I drew down the coverlet. Useless to try and describe the sight that met me, the icy chill I felt; she had been barbarously murdered! A handkerchief or string of some kind was tied so tightly round the throat that it had cut the skin, the eyes were protruding with a glassy stare, and a frothy mucus covered the parted lips; both hands were clenched, as in the last agony. That there had been a fierce struggle was evident, as well from the disordered state of the bed-clothes and one of the mats that lay under a tained a wooly curl that I know must have been torn in the conflict from the murderer's head. The coldness and rigidity of death were already creeping over the frame. "Poor unfortunate girl!" I groaned out, as I staggered against the wall. "this was the cry we heard." In some strange way the sight of that disfigured corpse imparted a sudden and almost unnatural courage. "God help me, I'll thwart this ruffian yet," I said, "and there's no time to be lost; my poor, kind-hearted Susan!" I then raised the quilt again over the dead discolored face; and, with a firmer tread than I had entered, left the room. "Let me see," I said, "I would not tell aunt yet," and when I returned, "On second thoughts," said I, "I have determined not to waken Susan a while, at all events till we be ready to depart; she would be sure to cause some disturbance in her fright."

"Oh, nonsense," aunt whispered, "I won't have the poor girl murdered and murdered in her bed without knowing or hearing a word; come, I'll go to her myself."

"Stop, aunt," I said. "you must not."

"Why? Oh, Maggie, is there any thing more?" For she saw the agitation that I could not conceal.

"Yes, dear," I said, "something; it be has murdered her already; we have but our own safety now to think of." I dreaded the effect of this intelligence upon one who was already so entirely unnerved by our terrible position; she sank back into her seat, and folded her hands with a look of passive despair.

"Poor thing!" she murmured, "I suppose she has only preceded us a little."

"Aunt," I said, "I must, and I knelt down beside her chair, and my voice was wonderfully steady and strong: "I am resolved on one last effort for our lives. I will hold in my hand, though I had not got into that room and bring out the keys without his hearing me, and then we might readily escape. See, its our only chance."

Aunt Osborne shook her head, and seemed bewildered about as to the course to pursue. I saw with fresh concern that a kind of apathetic stupor was stealing over her, and I dreaded that she might get a fit.

"Come, courage," I said; "God will not forsake us. Up quite certain that I slipped my dress round my shoulders, so as to be less impeded, I literally crept up stairs, advancing with extreme care, lest even a creaking of my shoes might betray what might indicate my approach. When I reached the lobby, I stood by the cloak-hole, as we called it, which received our outer garments, to listen, but there was not the least sound: then with, if possible, a yet more stealthy movement, I went on to the door of my aunt's room, stopped, second time during to draw breath for fear of arousing Parks's suspicions. I had felt marvellously firm and nerved up to this last step, but now actually on the threshold of the apartment where the assassin was, the full consciousness of the impending danger came over me with such force that I had not at my back, and my limbs shook so that I had to lean for support against the wall. I again called up the tragedy to know, that I had such a feeling of indignant execration as to quell the overpowering nervousness that had preceded it. I passed my hand gently along the door. It was half open, in security I felt, by any chance the key might be on the outside, and to my great joy I found it was; gently I took it, and, softly, I thought, a most merciful providence that it happened to be so. Somewhat reassured by this discovery, I went into the room. Here I assumed a stooping posture, fearful lest a possible gleam from the window, falling on my full height, might do mischief. I was then master of the situation, and my caution; an unguarded stir, a sudden encounter with any article of furniture, and we were ruined. To describe minutely how I crept, and kept sweeping my arm gently round me, treading step by step, more, as I afterward thought, like a person picking his way through a morass, than any carefully levelled every foothold for fear of sinking. At last I reached the small table: there in a momentary pause I heard the key that I had left in the particular article, and accompanied by a restless movement. I stretched out my hand quickly, too quickly in the intense eagerness to get hold of the key, which I did, and turned it over with a loud rattle. To grasp them all with one desperate effort, to turn and fly, regardless of silence now, to the door after me, unlock it and turn the key, all was the work of an instant. The relief with which I found myself in the passage on the lock side I may be better imagined than described. As rapidly as my feet could carry me I hurried down to my aunt's room, and entered so abruptly, however, to seize the garment that came first to hand, from where they were hung, as I thought, in the cloak-hole, that I startled her afresh. I saw by her look that she had imagined the worst, and I hastened to explain. "Quick," I exclaimed, seizing by the arm my half-scared companion, who could scarce be persuaded that the hope of extrication now open to us was a reality, "we must go by the back-door and out the little wicket at the other side of the house. The fellow evidently has accomplices outside, and we have not done with danger yet." It was no easy matter to get poor Aunt Osborne on ; she was in so great a terror that her limbs all but failed. We got, however, to the yard, and out at the small door, locking each after us, and so, avoiding the Laurel Walk, as the most probable place where the others might be watching or concealed, we ran on up the front avenue, and this it was I am sure that saved us; for those in the plot who were outside, concluding, I suppose, that we would endeavor to reach the gate lodge as a natural refuge, remained posted at that end of the house. By the same favoring Providence that had so far conducted us, a company of soldiers, with two officers and a magistrate, were passing the gate on their way to some station some patrol. I knew the latter gentleman, who lived in the town, and instantly informed him and the officers of what had occurred. A picked number of the men were dispatched to scour the plantations, and try and secure as many of the gang as they could find; while some more repaired to the house. No race it till after a long and fierce resistance that Parks h'mself was finally overpowered. The pedder was also apprehended, found hidden in the shrubbery. Parks and the pedder both expiated their guilt on the gallows, and suffered the last penalty of the law on a cross-road close by Blackwater Lodge, that for a long period after was—and for aught I can tell may still be—haunted. Parks's fate I will not tell any more than it is less than a week subsequent to the terrors of that dreadful night, my hair, that had been before black like the raven's wing, was white as the driven snow.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHY is a victory like a kiss?—Because it is easy to Grant.

A CONNECTICUT CONTRA.—"Arrah, Pat, and why did I marry ye, just tell me that—for it's meself that's had to wash the dishes every time the blessed day that Father O'Flynn nigus sint me to yer home?" "Swate jewel," replied Pat, "and it's proud that I am now that I may say this day you're a widder wagon over the covid end that kitvers me wid." "Be Saint Patrick, I'll on how ye pit along without me, honey."

"Old Bumblebee" was the cognomen of Mr. T., of Newburyport, and the little urchins in the village, as he passed to his bumblebee one day as he was singing his barn, and, in attempting to destroy the insect with his cane, he struck the horse on the thumb and forefinger, letting the insect go unharmed. "Why, you old bumblebee," exclaimed the driver, "I'll teach you to fly around between two heads of a horse he was putting up, when he had to call for assistance. The old man was in a terrible passion. He once put a bullet through a man who had insulted him, and was only let out on a gate instead of the post.

Two men met in a crowded state, with his hands about three feet asunder, held before him, begging the passers-by to help him, as he had got the measure of a doorway with him.

SIR ISAAC NEWTON'S nephew was a clergyman. When he had preached an excellent sermon, instead of which he always refused the fee, saying, "Go your ways, poor parson, I have as many pounds as you indeed sermons."

Old Mrs. Darnley is a pattern of household economy. She says she made a pair of socks last her fifteen years by knitting the feet only when them every winter, and new legs to them every other winter.

A MODEL "REPORT."—Mr. Jenkins, postmaster, had read a "report" from one of his men, that there was a "quarterly report" to hand-quarters. So when the time came he expected to hand-quarters he "reported" as the following:

Fulton on the 2 day of the 3 1865.

MR. JAMES BOKRASH president of united States.

Been required by the instructions of this post Office to report quarterly to hand-quarters. Herewith find my report, which is as follows: The Harvestin has been goin on pretty well most of the summer, have got about half through it, but there is only a average crop on millin lands corn is pritchin and won't turn out worth much. Health in this vicinity is purtin and most all the commonery is only tolerabl. Haven't had the honner of a call from a single member of the congress since I've been in office. Have nothin of interest to write about, so I'll close by hopin you are well and hearty. Hoping you may reply to mire Bukwheate I remain your obedient servant,

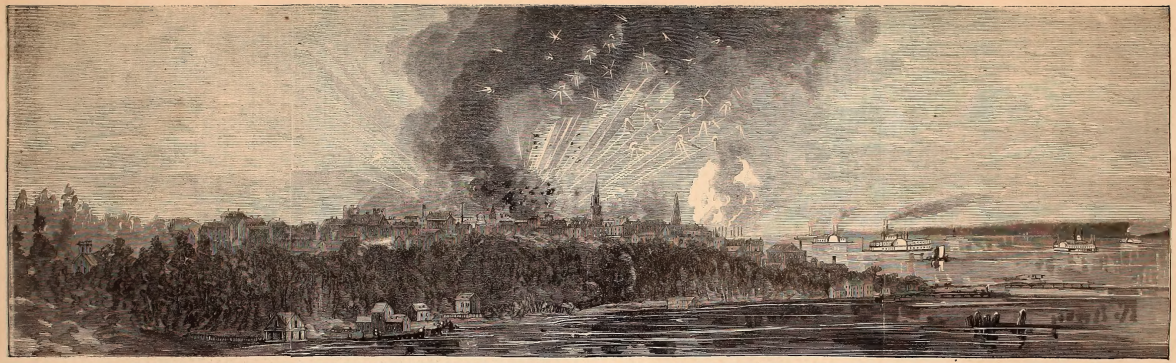
IRISH DOGS IN PARLIAMENT.—The following notice of dogs introduced into the House of Commons in the parliamentary papers: "Notice of motion, May 25—Dogs Registration Bill [Ireland]—Mr. Hennessy, to move for leave to bring in this measure." "Every dog found trespassing on unlicensed land unaccompanied by the proprietor, his agent, or the owner of other person, who shall on being asked give his true name and address, to be liable to a penalty recovered by such proprietor, or by his order." A contemporary asks: "Is it true that Mr. Hennessy has a dog that is accustomed to bark, shall be destroyed? or it is the owner or other person who is to be prosecuted for the offense of giving his true name and address?"



"Alot it wicked to rob dis chicken roost, George?"—"That's a great question, Cuffy, indeed; but what's him use to argue in here? hand down another pullet."

SECRETARY ROB HOSEE.—An old resident of Philadelphia has a colored servant which he has had for several years. For some time past the horse evinced a tendency to stumble, and the owner was afraid of it. One day a kind-hearted owner judged the animal off from his own, and received an equivalent in the shape of a pair of pebble-glasses, about the size of the object-glasses of a large-sized telescope, to put across over the horse's eyes. He appreciates the convenience wonderfully, and has never stumbled since he made the change.

AN IRISHMAN, "S TELEGRAPH.—A gentleman remarked a few days by as he was passing a piece of optics was now brought to such perfection that, by the aid of a telescope, he could be had just perceived, he could distinguish with an incredible distance. "My dear fellow," replied the Irishman, "that is nothing to the telescope of Herod, and that will be a match for it; it brought the church steeple of Tara so near to me that I could count the whole congregation singing psalms."

HOUSE-HAND JESTICE.—There was once a boy, in the olden time of Yorkshire Grammar, who had a wonderful definition in his book, "A noun is the name of a thing, as horse hair, justice." But he chanced to misconstrue it, and read it thus: "A noun is the name of a thing, as horse hair justice." He was of a contrative turn, and long pondered over the wonderful properties of a noun; but in vain, he could not make it out. It so happened that his father was a justice of the peace; and, one day, when the boy went home, the old man was holding a justice court. There he sat, in state among a crowd of people, on an old, cushioned horse-hair settee. A new light flashed into upon her boy's mind. "My father," said he, mentally, "is a horse-hair justice, and, therefore, a noun!"

EXPLOSION OF THE UNITED STATES RECEIVING MAGAZINE AT MOBILE, MAY 25, 1865.—[SKETCHED BY GEORGE WATTERS.]

CONFLAGRATION AT MOBILE, CAUSED BY THE EXPLOSION, MAY 25, 1865.—[SKETCHED BY GEORGE WATTERS.]

MISS EDWARDS.

MISS AMELIA B. EDWARDS is one of the most popular and successful of what may be called the minor novelists, and her progress is so rapid that we are not sure how long she can be ranked with them. Her story, "Half a Million of Money," now publishing in the Weekly, is her most finished and apparently elaborate work, characterized by the same lively and pleasant tone, and a certain domestic tranquility of impression which made "Barbara's History" so welcome to tired novel-readers. MISS EDWARDS's style is often fervent and eloquent. She has a sincere enthusiasm for art and for whatever is picturesque in nature; and her thoughtful feeling imparts a charming purity to her works. Her personal history is hidden from the public. There is a repose and air of elegant cultivation in her writings which compel us to believe that the sparkling serenity of her page flows from a happy and contented life. At least we may believe it, as we most cordially wish it, to be so.

THE EXPLOSION AT MOBILE.

ON Thursday, May 25, a terrible explosion, involving great loss of life and property, occurred at Mobile. We illustrate this event on page 396. About half past two in the afternoon the main Ordnance Depôt of the Government, on the corner of Lipscomb and Commerce streets, was blown up. Eight squares of buildings were demolished by the violence of the shock. It is estimated that the number of persons killed will reach fully two hundred. This will appear no large estimate when it is considered that nearly all the work-shops, foundries, cotton-presses, etc., which covered the vast area destroyed, were employing quite a number of men. A large number of persons were wounded. A number of the bodies recovered were so mutilated that recognition was impossible. Major STORCH estimates the amount of cotton destroyed at from eight to ten thousand bales: nearly all this belonged to private citizens.

The noise of the explosion was so great as to be heard at the distance of forty miles from the city. The steamers in the river suffered greatly from the shock, and a number of persons were killed. Two steamers were destroyed.

A man named WALL has been arrested at Mobile charged with being implicated in the explosion. He states that he and two other men, on the night previous to the explosion, placed torpedoes between the buildings containing the powder; that the work was performed under the direction of a rebel major, who threatened them with instant death if they disobeyed or offered to resist; and that the major afterward lighted the fuse of the shell connected with the infernal arrangement. Torpedoes have also been discovered in the Custom-house, so arranged as to explode on opening the doors.

HOW THE BRITISH TREAT PRISONERS OF WAR.—[FROM THE LONDON ILLUSTRATED NEWS, 1857.]

PRACTICE versus PRECEPT.

From English Papers, 1857.

"On the 12th of June, at Peshawar, forty men were tried, convicted, and sentenced to be blown from the guns. The execution was a dreadful sight. Three sides of a square were formed by British troops, and in the centre ten guns were planted, pointing outward. A prisoner was bound to each gun, his back placed against the muzzle, and his arms fastened firmly to the wheel. The signal is now given, and the salvo fired. The discharge, of course, cuts the body in two; and human trunks, heads, legs, and arms may be seen for an instant flying about in all directions. As there were only ten guns used on this occasion, the mutilated criminals had to be removed four times.... The scene and stench were overpowering. Precaution was not taken to remove the sponge-and-load men from the muzzles of the guns. The consequence was that they were greatly bespattered with blood.... All these forty criminals met their fate with the exception of two, and, to save time, they were dragged to the ground, and their brains blown out with musketry."

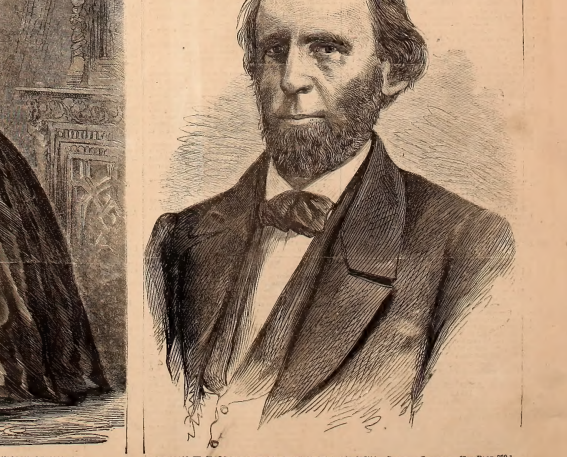
On another occasion two rejoined, "Hold your mivelingi! Die men, and not cowards. You defended your religion; why, then, do you crave your lives?"

From Russell's Journal, 1857.

"A French General expressed his regret at certain violences attributed to some of our officers in cold blood—I presume alluding to Hodson shooting the Princes of Delhi, and things of that sort. But he should know that here there is no such thing as cold blood at the right of a rebel.... When Nana marched from Allahabad his executions were so numerous and indiscriminate that one of his officers remonstrated with him that if he depopulated the country he could get no supplies."

From the London Herald, May 27, 1865.

"The [American] newspapers announce the capture of Mr. Davis in language of fiendish exultation. They gloat over the prospect of his judicial murder; and knowing, as we must presume, the character of those whom they address, promise it a glorious satisfaction in the indignities and pains to which the rebel President will be subjected. Still we would fain hope, for the sake of our common humanity, for our common kindred, that the American people may show itself in this critical hour more just, more generous, and more magnanimous than the drunken blackguard whom, after the fashion of an ignorant African tribe, it has chosen for its ruler, and the unscrupulous writers who try to earn its favor by flattering its lowest passions, and insist that the man whose rare abilities and high character have conferred a lustre upon the United States should be treated with fairness and justice.... To such a man there must be something inspiring and consoling in the prospect of such a death. His blood, he will be assured, will not flow in vain.



"He has done his duty. He has defended the cause of freedom and of right with almost superhuman energy; and having seen the noblest of his countrymen lay down their lives for that cause, he must desire to seal his testimony with his blood."

From the London Times, May 27, 1865.

"We confess that it is with much anxiety that we look forward to the probable fate of the Southern President. If slaughter can heal the wounds of the Republic, enough of human hecatombs have been offered at its shrine. There needs not another life to establish the fortune of the victors. For the credit of the American Union we urge the extreme impolicy of shedding the blood of a man whom a little success would have transformed from an attainted traitor into something very like an anointed monarch."

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered deeply incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific,—for cures which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past two years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as herculean as were ever encountered by any publication.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, remunerative process of Nature."

This is our reply: As the body is, like a well-balanced scale, it is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (Secondary) DISEASES ARISING FROM A FORMER TO SUCH.

PARAY'SIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only sure and safe remedial agent in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Remedy for

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (unsuspected) in the blood, filling life with untold misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, SCIATICA, GOUT, (TIC DOLOUREAUX).

If there's any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a specific, it is Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly relieved—sometimes entirely removed. Cases, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin.

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other diseases of the Blood, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, and bring them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Limbs, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a disordered condition of the liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will remove them, and restore the sallow cheek, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or sickly or unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PRICE $2 00

Produces healthy and vigorous growth; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay until the manes are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

EVERY BODY SHOULD READ IT!

WE MEAN

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

WILL BE READY NEXT THURSDAY,

Containing two charming, exciting, startling, thrilling, romances!

THE FIRST, ENTITLED

Owen the Convict;

OR,

THE HEART'S DEVOTION!

IS PERHAPS THE

GREATEST ROMANCE OF MODERN TIMES,

Not excepting the most popular of Dumas' works. It is the story of a youth pushed into crime by the force of circumstances, and of a pure, devoted, wholehearted woman, who refused to believe in his guilt, and nobly stood by him till the last. While it has all the touching pathos of the "Ticket-of-Leave Man," it is the same time is brim-full of the most extraordinary and soul-stirring adventures by land and sea. The hero gets out of one difficulty into another with a rapidity which is wonderful, and which shows the most unexampled ingenuity on the part of the highly-gifted author, who holds his readers as if spell-bound from the opening to the close. Old romancers who have read the manuscript—men who have been familiar with story-reading and story-writing throughout their lives—have been so enamored with this truly wonderful story that they have found it impossible to lay it down till they had read to the very last line.

THE NEXT STORY IS ENTITLED

The Cuban Heiress;

OR,

OLD HEPBURN'S SECRET!

This is from the pen of our highly-gifted contributor,

Mrs. Mary Kyle Dallas, and is, beyond question, the finest thing she has than far written. It is full of the most intense interest, and possesses a charm which can not fail to fascinate all who may read it.

United States 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES.

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already out, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will conduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-Thirties will commence on the 1st of June, and will be made promptly and continuously after that date.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES will be a matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, as the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Brandreth's Pills.

Costiveness, Diarrhœa.

They are taken up by the absorbents and carried into the circulation, through which medium they are conveyed to every part of the body.

If the pain affects the joints a single dose produces remarkable relief. And the same rule applies to costiveness, diarrhœa, and dysentery; though with the last named they may be required night and morning for some days before perfect relief is obtained. In affections of the lungs, throat, head, and pleurisy, the relief is certain; the excretory organs throw off with ease the phlegm, and the breathing becomes free. Spasmodic asthma is often cured by a single dose.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Se upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

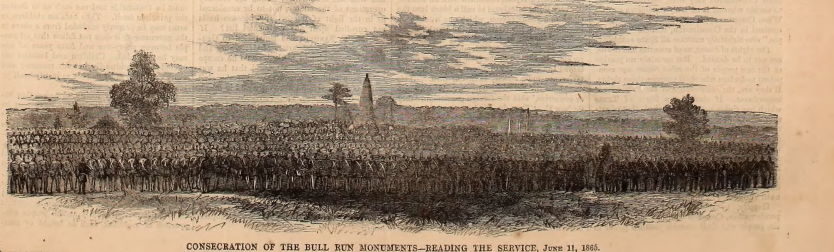
THE BULL RUN MONUMENTS.

THE battle of Bull Run was the first great battle of the war. It was proper that upon the field where it was fought should be erected the first monuments. The movement to erect such monuments on this field was quite impromptu. The idea was conceived by Lieutenant M'CALLUM, of the Sixteenth Massachusetts Light Battery, and under his superintendence the structures were erected in four days, being completed June 10. The next day, the 11th, was chosen for the observance of appropriate dedicatory ceremonies. The party engaging in the performance of these services set out from Washington on an early train. In the President's car were several distinguished officers, among whom were Generals HEINTZELMAN, MEIGS, WILCOX, and BURNHAM. One who accompanied the expedition gives the following account of the proceedings of the day:

"Arrived at Fairfax Station, about fifty ambulances and a large number of army wagons, tastefully shaded by evergreens, were found to have been placed in readiness by General GARNES, in command of that post, to convey the party to the battle-field. The morning was lovely, the air rather chilly, and the prospect of a pleasant trip rather unfavorable; but at ten o'clock the sun had dispelled the sombre clouds, and gave to nature a bright and cheerful aspect.



"The ride from the Station to Fairfax Court House, and thence to the battle-field, was delightful; and as the long procession moved over the hills and through the valleys of this once fertile now desolate region, all appeared to be deeply impressed with the interesting scene and the solemn occasion.

"Passing Centreville at about ten o'clock, we arrived at Bull Run bridge a few minutes before eleven. About three-fourths of a mile beyond the bridge, on the hill, is the site of the first monument. Arrived at the spot we found Colonel GALLAGHER, with his regiment of the Fifth Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, dismounted, a squadron of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry, and Captain SCOTT'S battery of the Sixteenth Massachusetts Light Artillery drawn up in line near the monument, with a fine brass band at their head. Soon afterward the band struck up a solemn dirge, and the troops, with reversed arms, marched up to the monument. A most impressive prayer and the solemn burial-service of the Episcopal Church was then read by Rev. Dr. M'MURDY, specially invited to officiate on the occasion. A hymn, written for the occasion by the poet PIERPONT, was sung, a salvo fired by the artillery, and addresses by Judge OLIN, Generals WILCOX, FARNSWORTH, and HEINTZELMAN, closed the exercises.

"About one-half of the party, including all of the distinguished personages present, repaired to Groveton, about two miles further on the right, where another monument had been erected, and where appropriate ceremonies, mentioned monument is about twenty-feet in height, and with 100-pound conical shells. This shaft will not, we are inclined to believe, last many years. It bears on its surface the inscription, 'Erected to the memory of the patriots who fell at Bull Run July 21, 1861.' The other is about sixteen feet in height, and is composed in great part of shot, shell, and other materials of war collected from the field. This monument possesses more interest than the first-named, and will probably endure for a much longer period. It also bears an inscription similar to that contained on the former.

MONUMENT ERECTED ON THE FIELD OF THE FIRST BATTLE OF BULL RUN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, AND PUBLISHED BY PHILP & SOLOMONS, WASHINGTON, D.C.]

"About four o'clock the greater portion of those present started on their return trip, the pleasure and harmony of which was unsolicited by a single unpleasant occurrence."

The illustrations which we give on our first page and on page 404 are from photographs taken on the spot by GARDNER, of Washington, and form a part of his interesting series of photographs relating to the war. The monument illustrated on our first page is that erected on the field of the first battle of Bull Run, fought July 21, 1861. The location of the monument is on a commanding crest, about three hundred yards southeast of the Henry House, and on the identical spot where HEINTZELMAN'S Division made their hardest fight, and from which they were finally driven back, by the arrival of KIRBY SMITH'S reinforcements, after having flanked and driven the enemy from Dudley Church until the Bull Run, where HEINTZELMAN and HUNTER crossed their divisions.

On page 404 we give an illustration of the Sixteenth New York Artillery firing a salute on the spot where RICKETT'S Battery was captured by the rebels in the first Bull Run battle.

The monument erected at Groveton commemorates the Second Battle of Bull Run, fought August 28, 29, and 30, 1862. An illustration of this is given on page 404.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1865.

REORGANIZATION.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON has issued his proclamation for the reorganization of most of the late rebel States. The first movement in every instance is to be a convention chosen by those who were voters by the State Constitution just before the ordinance of secession was passed, and who take an oath to the amnesty proclamation. The duty of the convention will be to re-form the State Constitution, and to prescribe the qualifications of electors and the eligibility of persons to hold office in the State.

If this were all that the convention is to do we might well be alarmed. The result of the late election in Virginia shows what the consequences would be. But President JOHNSON is doing what President LINCOLN did: he is feeling his way. Summoned to deal with an unprecedented condition of public affairs he moves with a proper and prudent caution. He has, of course, as well as any man that his proclamations proceed from the necessity of the case. There are practically no "people," politically speaking, in the late rebel States. There will be none except by the consent and upon the terms of the national Government. The President is now making the first step toward deciding who shall be the people of those States and exercise the power of determining electors—a power which, as he truly remarks, the people of the several States composing the Federal Union have rightfully exercised from the origin of the Government to the present time. The decision of this important point—namely, who are hereby set forth to be the people of the late rebel States, the President does not finally leave to a body of persons in the State arbitrarily selected by himself, but restors to the sole authority of the country which can rightfully determine it—the Congress of the United States.

It is not enough, in the President's opinion, that those who were voters at the time of secession, and who now take the oath, shall re-form the Constitution of the State. It is not enough that the Constitution so re-formed shall be accepted by such voters as that Constitution prescribes. The convention and people must, in the words of the proclamation, "present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefore." Congress alone in the judge of what is such a republican form; and until Congress accepts the re-formed or new Constitution of the State, there are no people in the State who have the power of determining electors. Thus by his proclamations the President merely invites those residents of the States who were formerly voters, and who satisfy his other conditions, to suggest to Congress what kind of a State Constitution they wish, leaving Congress to decide whether it be truly republican or not. When Congress approves, then the electors recognized in the Constitution, become "the people," who rightfully exercise all State authority.

The rights of States, as of counties and towns, are not to be united. But certainly no portion of the late people of the rebel States are competent to declare who shall exercise those rights. If they are, the interference of the President is impertinent. If there be a State of Texas which has rights not to be touched, that of setting the military in one of the chief towns among them; and, in that case, according to the theory of States which is now asserted in some quarters, the call of Mr. MURRAH, elected Governor according to the laws of Texas, convening the Legislature similarly elected, is more legitimate than that of President JOHNSON, which entirely disregards the action of the people of the State until authorized by himself.

Happily, by the terms of the President's proclamation, Congress will determine who are the people who shall exercise political power in the late rebel States. The proceedings in those States toward reorganization will therefore be extremely interesting as they are more or less likely to be recognized by Congress. What is already known of the character and views of the new House of Representatives assures us that no constitution will be approved which is not truly republican. The frank expression of Senator SHERMAN, one of the most cautious men in the Senate, indicates also the probable action of that body.

The power of Congress in the matter is incontestable, not only from the necessity of the case, which is so important a consideration in the whole question of reconstruction, but from the decision of the Supreme Court, which, according to the President's proclamation, those who may be summoned to vote are "to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefore." The process of reorganizing the States thus indicated by the President is analogous to that of organizing a Territory. We may not be willing to allow that the States have become Territories. We may insist that the States, as such, are only deemed to be in existence, or disabled, or whatever term better suits our theory. But all such speculations are, as Mr. LINCOLN called them, "pernicious abstractions." The important practical point is the return of the people of the State under a republican form of government to their relations with the National Union, and Congress alone properly declare the principles upon which those State Governments shall rest.

In his excellent treatise upon "Secession and Slavery," which we commend to all who are interested in this question, Mr. JOEL PRENTISS BISHOP quotes the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Permoli v. the First Municipality of New Orleans. When Louisiana was to be admitted Congress prescribed the insertion of certain specific matters in the Constitution to be adopted by the State. Mr. Justice CATRON, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "All Congress intended was to declare in advance in what manner the Territory the fundamental principles their Constitution should contain: this was every way proper under the circumstances: the instrument having been duly formed and adopted, it was for the National Legislature to judge whether it contained the proper principles, and to accept it if it did, or reject it if it did not." And Judge BISHOP does not hold that the States have ceased to be States; but he accepts facts, and acknowledges, as every thoughtful man must acknowledge, that the late rebel States have at present no power to remain within the Union, and can obtain one only upon the conditions which the Union may prescribe. For, as he cogently puts the argument, "Before he can be recognized Government in a State, there is certainly no republican form there, while the United States are constitutionally bound to secure such a form to every State.

When, therefore, Congress meets and encounters this question, it will proceed to settle it a hundred-fold more wisely than it would have been settled under the Louisians debate last winter. For the subject will be thoroughly discussed before the assembling of Congress; and the American people will understand perfectly their conviction that no form of State Government is republican which is not founded upon the whole body of adult freemen.

THE "ALABAMA" CLAIMS.

MR. ADAMS, our minister in England, is understood to have presented once more the little bill for the Alabama. The comments of the English press upon the subject irresistibly recall the chapter in DICKENS'S "Martin Chuzzlewit Friend," called "Podsnappery." Mr. PODSNAP addresses a guest at his table, who had been so unfortunate as not to be born in England. "This island was Blest, Sir," says Mr. PODSNAP, "to the Direct Exclusion of such Other Countries as—as there may happen to be. And if we were all Englishmen instead of Frenchmen," added Mr. PODSNAP, looking round upon his compatriots and sounding solemnly with his theme, "that there is in the Englishman a combination of qualities, a modesty, a responsibility, a reverence, a responsibility, a repose, combined with an absence of every thing calculated to call a blush into the cheek of a young person, which we behold with pride in vain among the Nations of the Earth."

Mr. PODSNAP at present edits the London Times, in which he says solemnly: "Certainly no state in Europe or the New World has maintained the principles of neutrality and non-interference more strictly than our own." This completes the parallel. Mr. PODSNAP: "And other countries," said the foreign gentleman, 'they do how?' 'They do, Sir,' returned Mr. PODSNAP, gravely shaking his head, 'they do.'" I am sorry to be obliged to say it—as they do."

He further says, in the London Times: "All that we now contend for is, that when a vessel does actually evade such fair vigilance as a neutral may be expected to maintain, a belligerent has no claim to be compensated." This opens the direct question of responsibility. If a neutral does not exercise fair vigilance she is liable for the consequences. Was the British Government fairly vigilant in the case of the Alabama? That is the point which an arbitrator would regard. What then, briefly, are the facts?

On the 23d of June, 1862, Mr. ADAMS told Lord RUSSELL that a formidable war steamer was building under suspicious circumstances at Liverpool. On the 25th Lord RUSSELL said that he would inquire at once. On the 1st of July the persons to whom the matter was referred reported that the builders did "not appear disposed to answer any questions!" and Lord RUSSELL declined to interfere until further proof should be presented. This was done. His Lordship made technical objections, but the proof was perfected on the 23d of July. On the 29th the opinion of the law officers of the Crown was received, and an order was sent on that day to detain the ship, which had dropped down, earlier on the same day, to Moelfra Bay, forty miles below Liverpool, on the Welsh coast. On the 30th July Mr. DUDLEY, United States Consul at Liverpool, informed the collector of that port that a steam-tug at Birkenhead was taking on board the guns for gun-carriages, and cutlasses. The consul had been authorized to communicate with the collector by Lord RUSSELL, but the collector refused to act. The tug put her munitions upon the Alabama, and she sailed. Thus the law officers took six days to decide that the Alabama should be stopped. On the day the order of detention was issued she drops out of the stream. On the following day the authorities are informed that a tender is loading for her. And on the same day, having received men, munitions, and supplies from the tender, the Alabama puts to sea, the Government meanwhile having taken no steps whatever. When assessment of damages for delay of six days, Lord RUSSELL admits that the case had been "a scandal and a reproach"—but the Queen's Advocate, Sir JOHN HARDING, had a violent pain in his stomach, and what could her Majesty's Government do?

If this be "fair vigilance" what is negligence? Mr. ADAMS says that the case as justly as it can be presented. "The omission to act in season is not denied. The inquiry committed on an innocent party is beyond dispute. If in these particulars I shall be found to be correct, then I respectfully submit it to your Lordship whether it do not legitimately follow that such a party has a right to redress and to ask redress. And, in this sense, it matters little how that omission may have occurred, whether by intentional neglect, culpable delay, or, having no reference to the merits of the question, the injury done to the innocent party giving a timely notice remains the same, and those who permitted it remain equally responsible."

We can not believe that any sober English man will quarrel with this statement. And if the British Government refuse to atone for what the Foreign Secretary calls "a scandal and reproach," it will make its country a scandal and reproach among the nations. We are assured by the public voice of England that the nation wishes to maintain friendly relations with us. Her Government has now an opportunity of showing the sincerity of the wish, not by any questionable step, not under menace, but by the frank and honorable resolution to repair the consequences of an official negligence so gross as to be characterized as "a scandal and reproach." Nothing could go so far toward healing the sore feeling of the last four years, and to restore actual amity between the people of both countries.

THE MILITARY COURT.

THE argument of REVERDY JOHNSON against the authority of the Military Court now sitting in Washington is elaborate and able. It rests chiefly, as the statements of all who have opposed the Court rest, upon the fifth amendment of the Constitution: "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

But is a man who enters the military lines of the United States and assassinates the Commander-in-Chief at his head-quarters, being sent for that purpose by the authority of the enemy and with the intention of aiding the military operations of the enemy, not to be considered as in the land or naval service because he is not enrolled upon any regimental list? If GEORGE N. SANDERS had penetrated to General MEADE'S head-quarters at Gettysburg and had secured him in his bed, could he escape a military trial upon the ground that he was not a true military offender, or that the civil courts of Pennsylvania were open and in operation? Are SANDERS, THOMPSON, TUCKER, and CLAY, organizing in Canada raids, poisonings, fires, and plundering, engaged in the service of the rebellion, not to be considered in the light of rebel spies because their names may not appear upon the rebel army roll? If BOOTH had had a rebel military commission, whether he had ever actually borne arms for the rebellion or not, would he not have been liable to a military trial for the assassination? The mere fact of his being a simple civilian, when empowered by the same authority to do the same deed for the same purpose, could not have exempted him.

If so, LEE, in order to serve his cause more amply, might, under instructions from the rebel authorities, have resigned his commission, changed his clothes, entered MEADE'S lines, murdered him, and then have pleaded his right to a civil court and a jury, as not being truly amenable to military trial. Is that the intention of the Constitution? If BOOTH had been a rebel picket when Mr. LINCOLN went to the front, and had been taken immediately after shooting him, he could have been tried by a military court. But was he less a rebel picket in Washington, doing exactly the same thing, merely because he was not in uniform, and held no commission?

Mr. JOHNSON appeals to the precedents of the attempted assassination of GEORGE THIRD, and of VICTORIA, to the murder of Mr. PERCEVAL as he entered the Parliament House, to the trials of HARDY and FOSTER in the early part of the century; but not one of the instances he cites is parallel to that of the present conspiracy. If England and France were at war, and the French authorities should hire an assassin to enter London, then garrisoned and under martial law, to take the life of the commander-in-chief at his head-quarters, is there any doubt that the murderer might be tried by military law? And if such a court were ordered by "the Executive Power of the day," does Mr. JOHNSON suppose that that administration would find itself unable "to withstand the torrent of the people's indignation?"

The views of an accomplished lawyer like Mr. JOHNSON will be regarded with respect by all who understand the question. But we have little doubt that Judge Advocate General HOLT will demonstrate the constitutionality of this military trial; while its policy will still remain an open question.

CORNER STONES

It is fortunate that the hearty celebration of our great national festival the Fourth, recognizing the true origin of government; for the Declaration of Independence throws great light upon the question. The people of the United States emphatically differ from the late Mr. CROATE. They do not contemptuously regard that instrument as "the passionate manifesto of a revolutionary war;" nor despise the truths it asserts as "glittering generalities." The entire structure of the Government for which so tremendous a war has just been so gloriously fought and so triumphantly ended rests upon the acknowledged truths of the Declaration of Independence. Those cardinal truths are two: first, that men are created equal; and second, that governments justly exist by the consent of the governed.

The equality thus asserted is very evident. It is not an equality of personal qualities, nor of mental powers, nor of social condition. It is an equality immediately defined as a common inheritance of right to life, liberty, and property; an equality before the law. The problem of government is simply how to secure and maintain this equality; how to protect the equal natural rights of men. According to our fathers this problem was made easy of solution by the principle they had already announced. The long experience of the world and of their world relation to Great Britain showed that no form of government was so likely to secure equal rights as one founded upon popular consent. If all men are born equal, no man and no body of men can have a right to limit or destroy the original rights of others. Hence government derives its power from the consent of the governed. Every subject of government must rightfully have a voice in it.

Universality is impossible. Young children, idiots, the insane, the criminal, are all governed, but they can not be intrusted with a voice in the government. Does it therefore follow that the principle is untrue? Does it follow because every individual can not actually take part in the government that therefore one class or a few individuals may govern all others? No. The application of the principle is limited by the conditions of human nature and by the welfare of society; but it is the basis of our social and imperative restrictions. The most obvious of such restrictions is that the limitation must be reasonable and not such as to destroy the principle itself. Thus persons serving in the arms may be properly excluded from a share in the government, it does not follow that all people between thirty-five and forty years of age may be excluded. Children and lunatics are excluded not arbitrarily but for reasons; and every exclusion must be able to justify itself by reason.

Thus it is utterly foolish to argue that because there must be limitations there may be unjust limitations; that, because paupers may be excluded, therefore shoemakers may be. The exclusion must rest upon some plain and universal reason: but even in that case no exclusion can be legitimate which destroys the original principle itself. And whatever the restriction may be, it must apply to the whole community. If the test be a certain literary proficiency, the ability to read or write; or a small freehold; or a certain residence; or a certain age; it must be impartially laid upon all people irrespective of accidents, such as height or complexion, the form of the features or the fashion of the clothes. For ourselves, we have little doubt that the good sense of the country will soon seriously consider whether, if the principle of our government be correct, sex ought to be a political disability.

For the present, however, the practical question is how far the people in North Carolina and other States, who will soon be called upon to reorganize their governments, believe in the fundamental principles of the American system. Do they believe that men are created equal? Do they believe that governments justly exist by the consent of the governed? Do they believe that taxation and representation ought to go together? If they do, they will frame republican constitutions for their States. If they do not, they will defer their restoration to the privileges of American citizens.

REBEL BELLIGERENT RIGHTS WITHDRAWN.

HOLLAND, FRANCE, and England have withdrawn their recognition of belligerent rights to the late rebels in the United States. The true history of the subject, so far as England is concerned, has been lately related by GEORGE BEMIS, an accomplished rebel agent of Boston, in a valuable pamphlet called "Hasty Recognition of Rebel Belligerency." In this clear and admirable work Mr. BEMIS shows conclusively that the British recognition of the rebels as belligerents was not a matter of necessity but of choice; and that the plea of EARL RUSSELL and of "Historicus" in the "London Times" that the order for the blockade compelled England "to follow the United States" in admitting belligerent rights was purely an after-thought.

The value of proof which Mr. BEMIS adduces shows thoughtful study and the acutest observation. His case is complete. Lord RUSSELL is convicted out of his own mouth and off his own pen. Even in his speech defending himself against Mr. BRIGHT, his lordship says that "our advisers told us we were entitled [not compelled] to recognize the existence of belligerent rights." The over-zealous "Historicus" had said two days before, "It was a matter not of choice but of necessity." The truth is, that at the time of declaring itself the Government of Great Britain had not been officially informed even of the intention of a blockade; and if it had been, the declaration of an intention of blockade is not such an interference with commerce as to justify un-friendly powers in declaring belligerency.

The President's blockade proclamation was issued on the 19th of April, 1861. It was officially communicated to EARL RUSSELL in a dispatch of Lord LYONS, which, in due course, was received at the Foreign Office in London on the tenth May. On the sixth of May Lord JOHN RUSSELL announced that the Cabinet, having consulted the law officers, had come to the conclusion that the "Southern Confederacy of America [in those days it was not "so-called"] must be treated as a belligerent." On the same day, four days before he had officially heard of the proposed blockade, he writes to Lord LYONS that "the Government" [meaning the Union—is in a state of "disruption," and that as "the provinces" are spread in arms against each other, the British Government can not refuse to recognize the "Southern States" as belligerents. He writes to Lord COWLEY at Paris in the same strain. But neither in his letters nor in his speeches is there the least mention of the blockade as leaving the Government no alternative. A civil war has broken out between the States of which the Union and the late Union." That is enough for the law officers; and his lordship, six days after he learns that the President intends to take steps to suppress a rebellion, recognizes the rebels as belligerents, and asks Lord LYONS to make no mystery of the fact.

This is what Mr. BEMIS mildly calls "Hasty Recognition." Whether a Government acting in such a spirit and upon such grounds was likely to preserve an honest neutrality, whether she would open all her eyes and stretch out all her hands to receive and detain unlawfully equipped ships, are questions not very difficult to answer.

A CONDITION OF PARDON.

THE form of the pardon granted by the President to repentant rebels is published. It takes effect from the day upon which the oath is taken prescribed in the proclamation of May 29, and is void if at any time thereafter the pardoned person acquires any property in slaves, or makes any use of slave labor.

There is no mistaking that condition. No wonder that BERIAH MCGOFFIN, of Kentucky, pronounces for the emancipation amendment. Henceforth the colored population of the late rebel States are personally free. That they are citizens has been already held by Attorney-General BATES. There are probably more than four millions of them—about a seventh of the entire population of the country—and they can never again be reduced to personal bondage.

Fortunately for the rest of us they are a mild and docile people; but, as a class, they are undoubtedly shrewder and more intelligent than the lower class of the whites—"the white trash" of the Southern States. In many of those States the colored population is in very large proportion to the whole—in some sections, indeed, it is more than half. With their new condition of freedom their character will inevitably change. Conscious of rights, they will naturally assert them. Free speech and a free press being secured throughout the country, they will hear their claims as American citizens discussed and proclaimed. Leaders among themselves, like FREDERICK DOUGLASS, will incite their ambition, and direct their efforts to obtain that equality before the laws to which every American freeman may justly aspire. They are destined to an important political element in the country, and until they obtain that political position from which no ruling but a prejudiced man dares the attempt to attain it will constantly agitate both the States in which they live and the country at large.

We say nothing but a prejudice debars them. We shall gladly own the error if the people who are to re-form the Constitutions of North Carolina and Mississippi limit the suffrage to all who satisfy a test of citizenship. If they do otherwise —if they allow ignorant persons to vote merely because they are white—our conviction will be confirmed. But such an exclusion, even if approved by Congress, settles nothing. For the moment it becomes lawful, the moment the subject passes from the immediate control of the country at large, the agitation for the proper State for a constitutional amendment forbidding any State to impose an unjust or whimsical disability, while in the States where the disabled population is large a party will immediately organize for an impartial rule of suffrage. And that party agitating for the political equality of nearly half the population will at last and inevitably prevail.

This unquestionable truth, and the fact that the President plainly informs the people whom he invites to begin the work of reorganization that the State, as a State, will be entitled to the guaranty of the United States against "invasion, domestic violence" only upon the presentation of a proper republican form of State government, must certainly have great influence upon truly sensible men in the southern States; but we fear that they will accept the situation. They will ask whether Congress can fairly be expected to guarantee against domestic violence a State which arbitrarily disenfranchises half of its loyal and industrial population; whether, indeed, such a guaranty would not be very sure to perpetuate internal convulsion and confusion. The answer to every such qualification for suffrage which is really republican. They will save the prolonged trouble, excitement, and expense of the disfranchised condition in which their blindness to facts will surely retain them.

CÆSAR UPON CONSPIRATORS.

WE observe that some of the papers which half excused the crime of JEFFERSON DAVIS and CLEMENT CLAY in the speech of ANDREW JOHNSON to the Roman Senate upon the Catilinian conspirators as a masterly plea for clemency to the rebel chiefs. We are certainly in favor of the utmost humanity, although what humanity is in any particular case may not always be indisputable. But a very false impression is conveyed if it be understood to be opposed to the severity of the law. On the contrary, it was for the full course of the law that he argued. The curious will find his speech in the Emperor's History of CÆSAR. CICERO, who had urged the law of punishment adequate to their offenses, I will approve the new measure; but if, on the contrary, the severity of the law seems too great, who can be imagined, we should adhere, I think, to that which has been provided by the laws."

THE SECOND CORPS.

THE frequent change in the commanding officers of several army corps has led to numerous misstatements which, without any intention on the part of writers, do injustice to some of the most worthy heroes of the war. This is especially the case with the Second Corps, which has been under the gallant General SUMNER; but it not unfrequently happens that in hasty or careless records his position as commander of the Second Corps is entirely ignored. We can say this with better grace perhaps from the fact that in our notice of the grand review at Washington we fell into the same error.

The Second Corps, commanded during the Peninsular Campaign by General E. V. SUMNER, may with justice be said to have especially borne the brunt of the "seven days' battles" before Richmond. At Malvern Hill the soldiers of this corps made for themselves a name which will never die. During McCLELLAN'S retreat at one time the command of the entire army devolved upon General SUMNER in the absence of the commanding General, the command of the Second Corps in the mean time falling to the brave General J. B. RICHARDSON, a division commander. RICHARDSON'S division, the First, consisted of brigades commanded by Generals HOWARD, FRENCH, and MEAGHER. At Antietam the Second Corps was commanded by General SUMNER, and it was here that General RICHARDSON, still commanding the first division, received a wound which proved mortal and deprived the country of one of its noblest soldiers.

Afterward General HANCOCK commanded the Second Corps, which is now under the command of General HUMPHREYS. The record of the Second Corps under these two Generals is too fresh in the popular mind to need any words of ours. Under such officers as MILES, BARLOW, and MOTT it has distinguished itself on every battle-field from the Rappahannock to the James.

A MEMORY.

THE autumn night is cool and still;
Why are we here? Who is so far away?
Why turn they to that summer day—
The day we fought at Malvern Hill?

I can not choose but see again
That fearful night—the cannon's breath
That brought the messengers of death—
The upturned faces of the slain.

And he whose heart in mine was woven
With sacred ties of plighted friendship's thread
Lay on the blood-red hill-side dead—
Dead, with his Spartan valor proven.

The night before the battle came
We lay beneath our shelters—tent;
Grim visions came, soft visions went—
We mingled dreams of home and fame.

The dear old walks appeared in view,
The sweet, familiar hearth-stone scene;
Then faces of armed men arose between,
And all the air was sulph'rous blue.

I woke; his eyes were closed in sleep—
In that deep sleep, that calm repose
That looks afar off to fancied woes,
And leaves the soul in angels' keep.

Ah me! one little day, and then
Where all the shades that we adore,
Like forms from off the shore,
He walked, and was not known of men.

He died the death; his life is past;
But that sweet memory that we hold
Of him I am, is more than gold,
And dearer than Fame's clarion blast.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

THE extent to which the work of reconstruction in the Southern States has been inaugurated is the following brief synopsis of facts:

On the 29th day of May President Johnson issued an Amnesty Proclamation, the provisions of which are already familiar to our readers. On the same day the President appointed William H. Holden Provisional Governor of North Carolina, to hold that office until such time as the regular government could be organized by the loyal people of the State.

June 13, Governor Holden issued a proclamation to the people of North Carolina, to the effect that at the earliest practicable period a convention will be held in accordance with the usage of the State, on the 2d day of September.

June 13, the President appointed Judge William L. Sharkey Provisional Governor of Mississippi. The same day he declared the insurrection to have ceased in Tennessee, and appointed William Johnson Provisional Governor, tasking to that State and its citizens. The same was declared in regard to the State of Missouri.

June 16, Governor Pierpont issued a proclamation convening the Legislature of West Virginia on the 4th of July.

June 17, Hon. James Johnson was appointed Provisional Governor of Georgia, and Hon. A. J. Hamilton of Texas.

Provisional Governors are yet to be appointed for Alabama, South Carolina, and Florida.

The following Southern States have elected regular governors, as follows: Kentucky, Thomas E. Bramlette; Maryland, Thomas Swann; Tennessee, William G. Brownlow; Arkansas, Isaac H. Fiegson; Missouri, Thomas C. Fletcher; Arkansas, John Murphy; Louisiana, James Madison Wells.

The following prominent rebels have applied for pardon and the restoration of property, under the President's proclamation: Alexander H. Stephens; R. M. T. Hunter; Alexander Mosely, of Virginia; W. Byrne, of South Carolina; T. O. Gholson, of Virginia; William T. Avery, of Tennessee; R. Ransom, Jr., Major-Generals J. B. Kershaw and William Mahone, George Pleasants and Abner Lee Brigadier-Generals J. L. Brent, Basil W. Duke, H. St. Count, M. J. Wright, H. P. Bell, Wm. D. Pete, William C. Wickham, R. E. Anderson, W. N. B. Pratt, W. L. Cabell, and R. L. Page.

NEWS ITEMS.

The report of the mutiny among the colored soldiers of the Texas Regiment at Brownsville proves to be unfounded. The story consisted of quite a general dissatisfaction arising from the misapplied zeal of a negro sergeant, Wm. Watkins, company positively refused to go. There was no difficulty in quelling this insignificant disturbance.

Generals Halleck and Stoneman have written letters to the War Department in reply to the circulars upon them made by General Sherman. General Halleck says there should be left with the responsibility of his orders in the premises upon Lieutenant-General Grant, and General Stoneman to claim that by acting upon his own judgment he compelled the fugitive Jeff Davis and his party to adopt a line of action which resulted in his capture by the troops sent out to head him off.

Governors Yates and Letcher are yet confined in the Capitol prison, and have not yet applied for pardon, although it is expected they will do so.

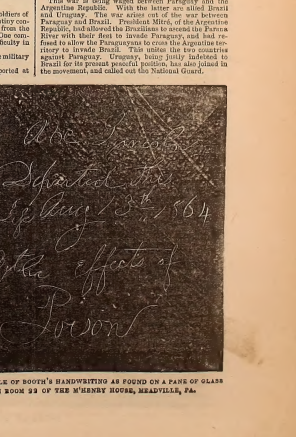
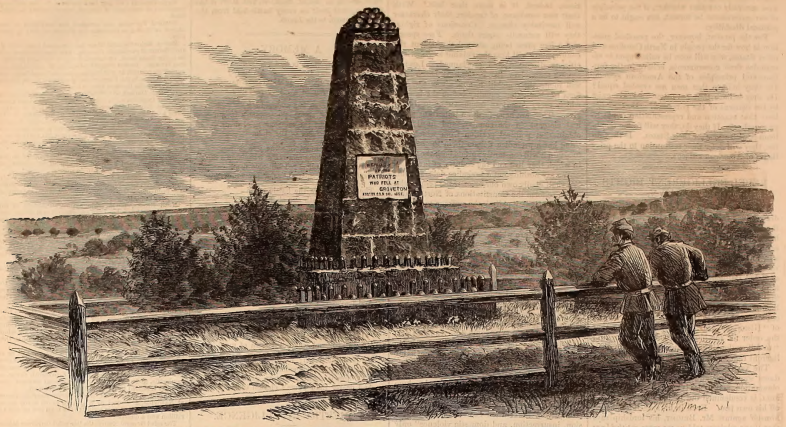
FOREIGN NEWS.



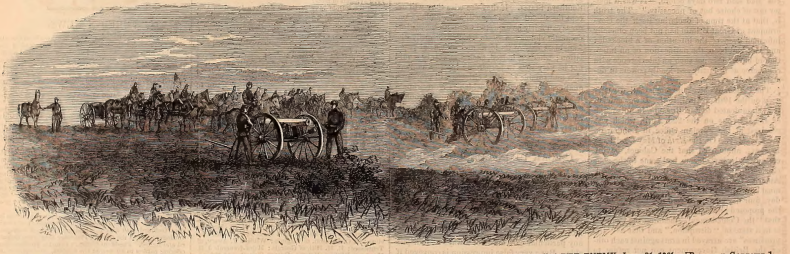
HON. FRANCIS and England have withdrawn from the late rebel Government the belligerent rights conferred at the outbreak of hostilities. Earl Russell, in his official declaration, informed Lord Lyons that the rebellion had within the whole territory of which the United States of North America, before the commencement of the civil war, every its undisturbed possession," and states that, as a necessary consequence, "her Majesty's servants considered the ports, harbors, and waters must henceforth refuse permission to any vessel of war belonging to a Confederate flag to enter such ports, harbors, and waters," and must require any such vessels forthwith to depart therefrom within twenty-four hours. There is, however, an added proviso that the commander of any rebel vessel may hoist his vessel of her warlike character and remain within British waters at his own risk.

The Mexican question is still exciting in France. M. Thiers, the leader of the Opposition in the French Chambers, in a speech on the budget, strongly deprecated the continuance of the French intervention in Mexico, urging that by its cessation an annual saving of at least fifty million francs would be effected. La Presse counsels its readers by arguing that the Monroe doctrine does not apply to Mexico, and that America is too exhausted by previous efforts to engage in a foreign war.



There has been for some weeks a rebellion in progress in the Republic of Hayti against the Government of President Geffrard. At first the insurgents were successful; but the tide of fortune has of late been in favor of the Government, and it is confidently expected that the rebellion offering pardon to all except the leaders, on condition of their returning to their allegiance.

Details of the war among the South American republics have been received from those of the Paraguayan war. The Paraguayan army is estimated at sixty thousand; the allied forces opposed to them at seventy-five thousand men.



This war is being waged between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic. With the latter are allied Brazil and Uruguay. The war arises out of the war between Paraguay and Brazil. President MITRE, of the Argentine Republic, had allowed the Brazilians to ascend the Parana River with their fleet to invade Paraguay, and refused to allow the Paraguayans to cross the Argentine territory to invade Brazil. That union of the two countries against Paraguay, Uruguay, being justly indebted to Brazil for its present peaceful position, has also joined in the movement, and called out the National Guard.

A FLIGHT IN THE DARK.

My father was an engineer before me, and gave up a tolerable business to take an engagement under a railway company; and when I left school he put me into his offices, where I staid till I was twenty years old.

"This sort of work won't do for you any longer, Tom," said my father to me one day. "You are beaux by nature as a clothes-prop, and round-shouldered as the lamp-post. We must get you out into the fresh air. Suppose you go as engine-driver for a couple of years; it will do your health good, and you will get an amount of genuine practical knowledge that way, which you could get in no other, while there will be a good deal more to you in your profession. When you have had enough of that, you shall try your hand at surveying for the new branch they are talking about."

So I, by no means loth, went into the engine-shed; and after a short experience as "cleaner," went out on the Firefly, as stoker, under old Sam Preston, one of the most experienced drivers on the line.

The life of an engine-driver, when once you have got over the disagreeableness of being, while on duty at least, in a constant state of grease black-duty at least, in a constant state of grease black-ness, is by no means either an unpleasant or an unhealthy one; and speaking for my own part, I certainly liked it much better than being cooped up all day in an office.

We had a week of night-duty and a week of day-duty alternately; and were always employed to run either the express or mail trains—a task for which none but the best drivers are selected. You must understand that all this took place more than fifteen years ago, when the railway system was in its infancy, and before the electric telegraph was as accomplished as it is now. The Firefly was running, on the week in question, between Melling and Ripping. Melling has two lines of railway running into it—one from the north, and one from the south-east; both of which lines meet at a junction about half a mile from the station, and run in their trains between those points on rails common to the two.

The Ripping mail started at eleven P.M.; that for the north half an hour earlier; and as my business was to be sure every thing in readiness a quarter of an hour before the time of starting, and to run the engine from the shed on to a siding close to the platform, just outside the yard, there to await the signal-bell which announced that the main line was clear, and then run back to the platform to take up our train. As we drove slowly up to our waiting-place Sam was in the habit of dropping off the unpleasant evenings to have a few minutes' gossip with a friend of his, a pointsman, whose quarters were in a box on the main line, a little past the pointsman's box, on my way into the station, in answer to the bell, Sam would lift his head, a good-sized dog blithely on to the engine, pull on his great-coat, tie a shawl round his throat, and prepare for the long dark journey before him. At the point where the Firefly took up her position, waiting for the signal, the line on one side was open to the fields, while on the other were several lines of opening on to an adjacent canal, beyond which lay the town of Melling with its thousand lamps.

I had driven up to the waiting-place one cold autumn night, dropping Sam, as usual, at his friend the pointsman's box, and had just lighted my pipe, thinking to have a quiet smoke for ten minutes before the bell should ring, when I was startled by the sudden appearance, close to the engine, of two gentlemen—the first of gentlemen, they were dressed as such—who seemed almost as if they had sprung from the ground, so quiet had been their approach, so unexpected was their appearance. "Gentlemen these," I muttered to myself, snuggling my pipe out of sight in hot haste. "Probably a couple of directors." Too had of them, though, to come prying about a fellow's engine at this time of night, trying to find out something against him. They'll fine poor him if they find him off his perch. One of the strangers was stout and the other was slim. They were both well wrapped up, the night was chilly; and the slim one carried a small, square, leather case in one hand—judging by that dim light it might be either a dispatch-box or a small portmanteau.

"You are waiting here to take out some train, young man?" said the stout gentleman interrogatively.

"Yes, Sir—the mail for Ripping."

"And that starts—when?"

"In twelve minutes, Sir, from the platform."

"Ay, just so." He began to walk slowly round the Firefly with his hands behind him, looking at her admiringly from every point of view, and talking to me all the time. "I suppose your engine is ready and entered ready for the journey?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And how far do you run before taking in fresh water?"

"We always take in water at Merryvale, thirty-eight miles from here. We have to wait there three or four minutes on account of the letter-bags."

"But supposing you had no train behind you, how many miles could you run to-night, say at the rate of forty miles an hour, before being obliged to stop for coke and water?"

"About seventy miles, Sir."

"About seventy miles! Just so. Really, these steam-monsters seem to me the most wonderful inventions of this or any previous age;" and as he said these words he mounted coolly on to the engine. Then I felt more certain than ever that he must be a director or some great railway functionary; while the slim gentleman with the dispatch-box, standing so quietly on the ground, beginning his chest with one hand to keep himself warm, was probably a clerk or amanuensis.

No sooner had the stout gentleman clambered up beside me than he commenced another rapid cross-fire of questions, and made me explain to him the method of working the engine. I showed him how to start her, how to stop her, how to put on the brake, and sound the whistle. He expressed himself as being immensely gratified; and when his list of questions was exhausted, called to the slim gentleman to get up beside us, in order that he might explain to him some more interesting point than common.

The slim gentleman, still holding the dispatch-box carefully, had hardly complied with this request when the bell sounded which summoned me to the station, and I at once started the engine.

"We will ride as far as the platform with you," said the stout gentleman, watching my movements attentively.

The ordinary programme of proceedings was as follows: on hearing the bell I ran the engine slowly forward to the second pointman's box, where a man was in waiting to turn her on to the main line, after running on which for a few yards she was reversed, and so run back, tender first, into the station, taking up Sam Preston at the first pointman's box on the way up.

On the present occasion, as soon as I heard the bell I sounded my whistle as a notice to pointsman number two; and on seeing his green light exhibited, ran the engine forward over his points till we were on the main line. I was just about to reverse the engine for the purpose of running back into the station when the stout gentleman spoke to me:

"How far is it from here to the junction where the line to Ripping separates itself from the north line?"

"About half a mile, Sir."

"And what means has the pointsman at that junction of distinguishing one set of trains from the other, or of knowing on to which line they ought to be turned?"

"His tables inform him at what time each train ought to arrive or depart; in addition to which the engines going north go with no distinct whistles, while those going south to Ripping and other places within the three times before mentioned, have to blow a note to the pointsman which route it is intended they should take."

"Just so; two whistles when you go north, and three when you go south. Le moment est arrivé!" Scarcely had the stout gentleman, who was standing behind me, uttered these words, when I felt myself most suddenly round the throat with an iron gripe, while my head was wrenched violently back, and the fourth moment I found myself flat on my back, in a mode of attack been known in those days, I should certainly have said that I had been garrotted.

When I came to myself I was lying on my back among the coke in the tender, with my over-coat put under my head by way of a pillow. I staggered to my feet, feeling very much as if I had come with a shocking sensation in my throat that was far from agreeable. The Firefly was tearing along at a terrific pace, with no train, and, I knew, going, too, not south to Ripping, but along the main line to the north, as I saw when I looked round, for the night-mail was gone, and the scene brightly, and I was familiar with every turn and feature of the landscape. Melling was two miles behind us, and we were already at the point where the line from the south joins the main line. I had just time to make these observations when the stout gentleman turned to address me.

"Getting round again, I perceive," said he; "you will be all right in another quarter of an hour. Here, take a flask of wine, and you will find it will improve you wonderfully. You will, I am sure, forgive me the little rudeness I perpetrated a few minutes ago, considering the service I am to ask of you. You are better already, I see. And now I will yield up my post of driver to you, having every confidence in your ability to bring your train in a refined safety to our journey's end."

"And where may that be?" asked I, somewhat timidly. "This is not the road to Ripping."

"Just so. It is the line to the north on which we are now traveling—I whittled twice at the junction, according to your instructions—and it is northward that I wish to go. My friend and I were too late for the mail; we could not afford to wait for the next train, which, in fact, does not start till six-to-morrow morning; so were compelled, in this rude and violent fashion, to invent a special for ourselves."

Fool that I was! how egregiously had I allowed myself to be deceived! I, who had been on my guard all these years for that awful personage, a railway director; whereas the two of them were probably nothing better than a couple of lunatics. Well, what fine punishment I should be visited when I got back to Melling I durst not just then pause to contemplate. It was clear that I was in their power, acting against my will; but I had been wrong, in the first place, in allowing a stranger to get on to my engine, and so rendered myself liable for any mischief he might commit, and finally in my hands. The mail would be delayed; and when it was discovered that I had allowed a couple of strangers into custody, and prove my innocence at the same time.

"This sort of thing may seem a pleasant game to you," I said, turning to the stout stranger, "but it's dangerously unpleasant to me." He gave a grim laugh. "I understand, once for all, that I, and not you, am master of the situation; and that it is for you to obey my orders implicitly. Refuse to do so, or attempt to play any fool's tricks with the engine, and I will scatter to the winds what little brains you possess, and scrunch your bones under the wheels of your own engine." At the same instant I felt the cold barrel of a pistol pressed to my temples, and I staggered back, and should have fallen from the footplate had not the stout man caught me by the collar and dragged me back.

"There, now," said he, good-humorously, "you owe me some thanks for having saved your life. Do as I tell you, young man, and you have nothing to fear. I pledge you my word to restore you in safety to the arms of your disconsolate friends."

I saw at once that further resistance just then would be useless; I had better make up my mind to the orders of the mysterious stranger, keeping, meanwhile, both eyes and ears on the alert. So, with a shrill whistle, we flew past Fallow at the rate of a mile a minute, a lot of coke into the furnace, and poured a little oil here and there among the joints of the machinery, and went about by about my work, as though no strangers were present, but always keenly observant of what my companions were doing.

"I am glad to find that you have come to your senses so readily," said the stout man. "Keep your engine up to the mark, and your journey will be done all the sooner. So saying he proceeded to fasten a white woolen comforter round his throat, and to put on a traveling cap in place of his hat; after which he lighted a cigar and turned to look at his friend.

The slim man (gentlemen I call them no longer) had taken no part in the conversation; but seated from the first in one corner, with the dispatch-box between his knees, he had seemed to take a very despondent view of his position. Him the stout man now turned to address; but when he spoke it was in the French tongue, evidently that I might not understand what was said; neither of them dreaming that the black, greasy-looking stoker knew more than was acquainted with the languages than his own.

"How melancholy you look to-night, my friend!" said he; "you who would think you were in love, so forlorn as you sit there. All our plans have succeeded; and although we missed the express, the little matter of 10,000*l.* in the train, that Monsieur coup-de-main, who shall not be above half an hour late at our destination; and we shall have very much more than that when we get to Ripping. This night, of all nights in the year, you ought to be as merry as a blackbird; for now you have your revenge, and something like revenge for which you have been sighing, day and night, for six months past. So cheer up, my child, and be light-hearted as I am. Let the future take care of itself. Vive la bagatelle!"

"It is so old sitting here," replied the slim man, with a shiver, "and nothing to occupy either one's fingers or one's thoughts."

"It is because your thoughts are so busily occupied, my friend, with the past, gloomy and affrighted. But you said you were cold: here, drain this flask—choice cognac, I assure you; not a headache in a headache's full of it. Come, drink this ever-out of mine; for myself, I can do just as well without it;" and unheeding the remonstrances of the other, the stout man lifted the flask to his mouth, and emptied his friend into it, then poured a quantity of cognac into the cup of his flask, and made him drink them, in spite of his insisting that he should try a cigar. But in spite of these friendly attentions, and the cheering words which accompanied them, the slim man remained silent and shivering, brooding over some dark secret, known only to himself and his friend. We were already round to the left hand line, so as to cheer the other were unwilling, he turned away with a muttered execration, and trouble in the mind, and remained in the dark, went on smoking his cheroots and watching all my movements attentively, as though he feared I might play him false.

He asked me the name of each station that we passed, and its distance from Melling; and he became impatient more than once or twice, when the red light (the signal to stop) was exhibited at some station; at which times I had to slacken speed, and while the train was pulling up in its place, bend my again put on all steam and tore on our way. The cold glitter of a pistol-barrel would meet my eye on my right hand, and the question would fall on my ear to beware that I did not attempt any treachery. But the dangerous point, more than the pistol would be used for a while, and the stout man would go on smoking more furiously than ever, as if to make up for lost time. He took no more notice of me, and when he held it to the lamp to see the hour I had for the moment a clear view of his face.

It was by no means ill-looking, and seemed to be about forty years old. He wore a thick black mustache, but the rest of his face was closely shaven; he had dark piercing eyes that seemed to look through you; and, for the rest, was in manner and appearance more a gentleman on nine-tenths of those who usurp that honorable title.

I kept the furnace of the Firefly well supplied with fuel, and we were now at a gallop along. As I was determined to end this strange journey as soon as possible. Past one mile-post after another—standing out distinct against the dark embankments; with ever and anon a station, big or little, rushing madly up to us, staring at us blankly for a few moments, and then left on with a thousand iron tongues to stop, as it receded swiftly away into darkest space; under bridges innumerable; into darkness and out of blackness that vanished in an instant; then into the great tunnel, wrapped and lost in its breath of steam and smoke, awakening its thousand echoes that have little time for sleep; and so out again into the fresh cool night; away—away—away—and sleeping village, and still great furnaces that flare their hearts out to the unheeding stars: onward we went till Burkleigh station was reached, and sixty miles of journey had been achieved.

I gathered from the stout man's observations that he was acquainted with this part of the country, and that our flight in the dark was now almost ended; indeed, the Firefly, good little engine though she was, could not have held out much longer without a further supply of water.

Half-way between Burkleigh and the next station, "Hall," I was told to stop, at the point where I wish to stop. You will make your arrangements accordingly; and you will further understand, that when I leave the engine you will accompany me. I can not afford to dispense with the pleasure of your company just yet."

Here was a new view of the case with a vengeance! and just as I was calculating how comfortably I could work my way back to Melling, and reach home in time for an early breakfast.

I remonstrated, but to no purpose; he stopped me sternly, and at once. "Keep your engine off the main line on to the first siding you come to," said he, "and see, for the rest, hold your tongue."

I slackened speed at once; and about a mile further on we came to a small branch-line leading to a cattle-station, and there I ran her in. The train was got down, and held the points open by my direction, while I ran the Firefly off the main line, and brought her to a stand. Then, I let off the steam and raked some of the fire out of the grate, while the others stood by watching me impatiently. When all was done that was necessary the stout man took me by the shoulder and addressed me impressively.

"Look here, my young friend," said he; "you have acted sensibly to-night in not disputing my orders. Continue to do as I tell you and no harm shall befall you. Any attempt to deceive me, or to take French leave, and you will have something sent after you that will astonish you forever. On your part you must mind easy—I am a dead shot; I never miss my aim."

"Good ahead," said I, sulkily; "you needn't talk so much about your confounded pistol."

The stout man replied with a laugh, and slinging the dispatch-box by a strap over his shoulder, led the way at a quick pace from the branch line over a tract of rising ground, out on to a wide stretch of bleak moor-land, intersected by several roads, never hesitating for a moment as to the path he ought to take, but leading the way as confidently as he might have done had it been by every inch of the ground, which probably he was. I followed close behind, and with the slim man brought up the rear. And thus we kept on for a full hour, and came to a plantation of fir, the edge of which skirted the road we were traversing. Here the stout man halted twice in a peculiar way, and we all stood still to listen. In a moment the response came—a whistle similar, and close at hand. Next the sound of the hoofs of horses, and presently a carriage of some kind came out of a narrow lane that ran by one end of the plantation, and drove right up to where we were standing. As well as I could make out by that light it seemed nothing more than an ordinary hackney coach, which perhaps is a better term than common in the shafts; while, as for the driver, he was so thoroughly muffled up that it would have been impossible to recognize him if I knew him. He began to swear at us, as soon as he got near enough to be heard, for having kept him waiting so long; but at a few words uttered by the stout man took his objurgations lapsed into a muttered curse or two, and then died away in sullen silence. We three got inside the coach, the two gentlemen first, who quickly inside the cab; the windows were closed and the blinds pulled down; and we were driven off at a good pace, which was kept up without break or rest for what seemed to me a very long time, till at last we rattled over the pavé of a town, and drew up at the door of a private house. I had some acquaintance with that part of the country, and I knew that within a radius of fifteen miles there was no town but where all the engine three country towns were situated, all of them busy, populous places. To which of these three could I have been taken? On this point I was as helpless to form a judgment as if I had been born blind.

On alighting from the coach I had only time to take one hasty glance round, and to observe that we had been driven into a small court or inclosed yard, overlooked by high, gloomy buildings on every side, save a door in front of us was silently opened, and we all went in. The door seemed to close of its own accordance, and in the next moment a light appeared at the further end of the long passage in which we were standing, carried by one of the most extraordinary looking human faces ever before beheld. He seemed, at the first glance, more like a resuscitated corpse than any thing else; he was tall and thin, and dressed in a long, dark, shrivel-up little face—the face of a century-old age, lighted up with two eyes so restless, so preternaturally bright and bluey seemed to distrust every body, himself included. He was dressed in an old red flannel dressing-robe, which fell in ominous folds to his shrunken feet, while his cadaverous jaws were bound up in a dirty white handkerchief, fastened in a huge knot on the top of his head, on which a few spiky hairs were still sparsely scattered. Holding the lamp above his head with a shaking hand he grinned a hideous welcome to us all, and ushered the stout man with the familiarity of an old friend.

"Welcome home again, Mr. William—welcome home!" he muttered. "What! and the rest, too! And—what luck? But who are these? Strangers, eh? Friends of yours, did you say? But are they safe, Mr. William—are they safe?"

Chattering thus, the old man led the way into a large but plainly-furnished room, where a table was laid, ready for supper, as it seemed, for a number of one or more had been expected. Another plate was quickly brought, and the saltenly-looking middle-aged woman who waited upon us served up a plain substantial supper, to which we all did ample justice. The slim man seemed, if such a thing were possible, to grow more silent and despondent with every mouthful that he ate. Behind his chair stood Black Care, the terrible, the haunting, the persistent; the garments of gray and pallor with a touch of its skeleton finger. As for the old man, he mumbled and gabbered away to himself, and chuckled, unheeded by every body, Mr. William being just then too much preoccupied with his own thoughts to pay the least attention to him.

When supper was over, Mr. William and the old man left the room together; but in a few minutes the door reopened, and the latter beckoned me to follow him. I accordingly stumbled after him up a long dark flight of stairs, and was then ushered into a room having a small camp bedstead in one corner; while close to the bright, blazing fire stood a large easy-chair and a small table, in the former of which the old man was already seated.

"You will have to make yourself comfortable here for the night," said the stout man, turning to me. "That bed is at your service; and here," putting the old man on the shoulder, "is one who will attend to your requirements. Good-night, and pleasant dreams."

So saying, he quitted the room, locking the door behind him; and I was left alone with the old man, who grinned and nodded his withered head at me, and pointing to a chair in the opposite corner, invited me, in a shrill quavering voice, to come and sit down by the fire, unless I felt disposed to go to bed at once. As I never felt less inclined for sleep in my life, I drew the chair up to the fire, and sat down opposite the old boy, who was busy concocting a basin of grog for himself, he having taken no part in the supper down stairs. I tried him with a few questions, but especially desirous to know how long it was probable that I should be detained there against my will; but as each of my questions the old rascal put on a vacant puzzled look, and replied with something altogether irrelevant to my question; so that, after one or two futile efforts to get a sensible answer, I gave up the task in despair, and watched him in gloomy silence while he took his gruel, seasoned largely with cognac.

Sitting thus, I heard from some far-off steeple the faint tones of a clock tell the hour of three, and I remembered for the first time that it was Sunday morning. It would not be daylight yet for three hours. Following close upon the striking of the clock came the rattle of a distant cab or mail-cart, rattling over the paved streets: there was a pleasant sense of companionship in the sound that spoke warmly to my heart, and brought with it no intense longing to escape.

To escape! was such a thing possible? My heart throbbed, as the thought rushed to my face when first asked myself the question; so that when I looked up, and saw the old man's suspicious eyes fixed truly on me, I felt as if my hidden thoughts were discovered. But I sat very still, and strove to look as unconcerned as possible; and when the old man was satisfied with his gruel, I set to work to evolve quietly out of my brain some plan of deliverance. The door at which I already said, was locked on the outside; but even had it been otherwise, to venture down through the floors of the house would have been a most dangerous proceeding. The window, then, was the point to be considered. This was secured inside by stout shutters, but there would be no difficulty in opening them; the only real obstacle lay in the fact of the window being so high above the ground—far too high for me to drop from. Then there was the old man to dispose of; that, indeed, was the first thing to do, for once let him give the alarm, and all my efforts would be fruitless.

I sat absorbed presently for about half an hour, at the end of which time I had thought out a plan which seemed to me the only one at all feasible. There were several pieces of wood lying on the hearth, fragments left after the fire had been lighted. I picked up one of these, and in the course of a few minutes had provided it with my pocket-knife into a sort of rude spatula, round which I tied a piece of stout string that I found in one of my pockets. The old man watching my movements apparently, apparently unsuspicious of what I was about to do.

Every thing was now ready for my attempt. Occasionally I heard the faint murmurs of voices below, showing me that there were other inmates of the house still awake; and now and then the opening or shutting of a distant door sounded preternaturally loud at that quiet hour. I confess that now the final moment was come my heart failed me for a minute or two, and I began to doubt my ability to carry out my plan to a successful issue. But this fit of weakness was of short duration, and gave place to an unflattering resolution to do and dare every thing to effect my escape.

I rose suddenly from my chair, stepped across the hearth in two strides, and seized the heavy rascal by the throat. "Speak, or make a noise, and I'll murder you!" I whispered sternly in his ear, and I passed the bright blade of my knife close before his eyes. Then, before he had time to recover from his shock of an attack so sudden and unexpected, I had twisted the bell-rope into a large loop, far out of his reach as he sat. "Open your mouth," I said to him, "but do not speak, or you die." He was shivering with fright, and hardly sense enough left to understand what I said. "Mercy! mercy! good young man," he gasped; and then the piece of wood was forced between his teeth, and tied securely in its place, and he could say no more. The next fastened his hands behind him with my handkerchief, and then a sheet off the bed, and secured it with my knife into long strips, twisted these, and proceeded to tie him securely in his chair. When I had satisfied myself that he was so fastened that it would be impossible for him to release himself, and further, that he was in no danger of being choked by the gag, I turned my attention to the window, and having taken off my boots, so as to make as little noise as possible in crossing the floor, I proceeded to try the shutters, and after five minutes' patient labor succeeded in opening them almost in silence.

The next point was the window; but I found, to my dismay, when I came to examine it, that it was composed of small diamond panes set in lead, and opened by means of a casement only, far too small to permit any hope of egress that way. My whole scheme seemed to collapse as I looked, for the intention had been to escape through the window, and reach the ground by means of a rope made out of the bed-clothes. What to do now I knew not; and as I turned despairingly away the old man's eyes met mine with a malignant glance of mingled rage and triumph. Suddenly a thought struck me. Although the stout man, on leaving the room, had locked the door behind him, was it not probable that the old man had in his possession another key that would open it? This was a question that I solved at once by searching him, and in one of his pockets I found a peculiar key—a master-key, I imagine it to have been, which probably fitted every door in the house; and all events, it opened the door of my prison, as I was not long in discovering. Although this was only the first step toward my escape, I could not repress the joyous bounding of my heart when the door turned on its hinges, and I stepped cautiously out on the landing, and then stood listening to the murmur of the voices below stairs. But the most difficult part of my enterprise was still before me; this was to pass without discovery the open door of the room below, and then go down the second flight of stairs to the ground-floor, and so out by the front door. The first attempt to succeed at all must be made at once, before the stout man came up stairs, which he probably would do ere long, to look after the safety of his prisoner.

Before venturing down in the direction of the voices, I gave one last look behind me, and then examined once more the bonds of the old man; then I blew out the candle, and locked the door; and, having secured the key, crept on my hands down the stairs, one at a time, pausing to listen between every step. Fortunately, the house was one of the old-fashioned kind, and strongly built; and not the faintest creaking of a stair betrayed my presence. At length I reached a large landing, giving access to four rooms, the door of one of these rooms was only partially closed, and through the opening shone a faint stream of light. Down now and then, and another set or two, whose tones I at once recognized, told me that there sat my captor and his friend. That door was passed nearly over by the time I reached the landing, but they still seemed to be silently busy over something. What was their occupation business that occupied them at such an unholy hour?

Noiseless as a shadow I moved forward till I stood on the mat at the entrance to the room. The door was too far closed for me to see the occupants of the room, or for them to see me; but from where I stood I could see the reflection cast on the large pier-glass which stood on it; and in this glass I could see the reflection of the stout man and his friend—and they, too, if they looked, they were doing, which kept them so silent and so busy.

They had got the brown leather portmanteau open between them, and were busily examining its contents, which consisted of watches, chains, rings, and pins, together with several small boxes filled apparently with articles of different kinds—all, without doubt, the proceeds of some great robbery. I stood like one fascinated, forgetting for the moment my own affairs in my eagerness. At length the stout man spoke. "A very pretty little haul, Master Markham," he said. "A nice little haul, and one that we've done for a long time, and neatly done too, though I say it that shouldn't. I've got two little blokes that'll remember things so stain which will do admirably to hold the swag. I'll go and fetch them, and then we'll make a fair division of the spoil, and you can take your share, I must give a look to that young shaver up stairs, and see that he's all right. I'm puzzled to know what to do with him. What, I say?"

"Stick a knife in his gizzard!" suggested the slim man, with a yawn.

"No, no, it won't do that, if we can help it," answered his companion. "That's a line of business I've never gone into yet, and I don't mean to either. Hush! listen a bit, there's a bloke for all tales.' I'd rather have a live one to deal with any day of the week. No, I must think out some better method of getting rid of him for a few days till we've got quietly away. Not, mind you," he added, "that I would hesitate to put a knife into him if I thought it was up, and I thought he was going to blow upon our little affair."

He got up and pushed back his chair. "Now, you stay here," he said, "while I run up stairs. It shall be back in five minutes, and then we'll go share and share alike."

I waited to hear no more, but hardly knowing what I did, or whither I was going, sped noiselessly on tip-toe again. Before reaching the hall, I noticed on the upper landing a small closet or lumber-room, in which stood a large ragged screen. In that hole I determined to conceal myself for a few minutes or two behind this screen, and take my chance of escape in a rush down stairs, while the stout man was engaged with the old rascal over the discovery that would greet him on entering the room where I had been confined.

By the time I had reached the landing the stout man was ascending the lower stairs, and the same instant that I crept behind the screen he paused opposite the door to feel for the key, and to assure himself the door of my prison was opened, and he went in. "Hallo! what's this? Why are you in the dark?" I heard him exclaim; and the next moment my hiding-place, crossed the landing, and turning the key in the lock, made fast the door. All was done so quickly, and then rushed down the first flight of stairs at a breakneck pace. I paused for a second or two on the lower landing, nothing, with some surprise, as I did so, that the room where the two men had been conferring only a minute before was now in darkness. But my back was to them, and awaited the return of his friend, as the latter had requested him to do? That, however, was a question which light soon solved for my curiosity.

I had now the lower flight of stairs to descend, and here I was obliged to proceed more cautiously, being unacquainted with the ground. I had turned two corners in safety, and was on the top of the last short flight, when a sudden thundering at the locked door above startled me from my balance, and I stumbled headlong down the remaining stairs, and, bursting open a door at the foot of them, and landing in a large kitchen, at the other door of which—the door leading into the street—stood the slim man, with a very white face, trying with nervous haste to unfasten the bolts, and so let himself out. On the dresser close by his side stood the candle brought from up stairs, and at his feet the portmanteau shut and partially strapped. I understood his little game at a glance, even if his ghastly tell-tale face had not proclaimed it. He had taken advantage of his comrade's brief absence to abscond with both shares of the stolen property, trusting in the darkness to get clear away with it across the whole of the booty to himself. A look of relief shot over his face when he saw that it was not his terrible comrade come to avenge his treachery. With a snarl of rage he turned from the door, and drawing a pistol from his breast fired it point-blank at me just as I was rising from the ground. The wind caused by the bullet stirred my hair, but there was no further damage done, and before he had time to fire again I had sprung at his throat, and we grappled together, and sealed from side to side of the room in a wild struggle for life and death. He was agile and wiry as a panther, and quite my equal in sheer physical strength, for you must remember that I was little more than a lad at that time; and it would perhaps have gone hard with me had I not brought to bear a little trick with the leg which I had learned among the Norfolk Island wrestlers, which stole his feet from under him before he knew what was the matter, and brought him crashing to the ground, with me on the top of him.

In falling, he struck his head with tremendous force against the edge of the oaken dresser, and next moment his grasp relaxed, his eyes closed, and a pallor as of death overspread his face. I thought, in truth, that he was killed.

All this time the stout man was thundering at the door above stairs, making desperate efforts to get out; and now, as I rose and looked to my feet the instinct to escape, to get away from that horrible house, came over me as strongly as before. I drew the remaining bolt, and opened the door, and felt the cool night air blow freely over me with a feeling of thankfulness which no words of mine could express. For a moment, as I crossed the threshold, for a last look at my opponent lying motionless across the hearth, and as I did so my eye fell on the portmanteau, and acting on the impulse of the moment I seized it, and flinging it over my shoulder passed out into the street, and then ran away into the silent streets.

To the first constable whom I met I gave myself and the property up, telling him, and was by him hurried off to the station, where I told my strange story in as few words as possible; and four constables were sent to the house, which was at once recognized from my description, as it had long been looked on with suspicion. When they reached it, the bodies of two out of the three inmates of the house; but the stout man had got clear away before their arrival. The slim man, who had received his death by this time, finding the game up, volunteered a confession, the details of which were afterward found to be substantially correct, and by the time I was ready to be called I was ready to give us briefly as may be.

The jewelry, etc., contained in the portmanteau had been stolen from the establishment of Bellingham & Co., the great jewelers and silversmiths of Melling. Mr. Bellingham's chief assistant and confidential manager was Mr. Matthew Langlough—he who has hitherto been designated as the slim man —a person who had gradually worked himself from the position of clerk to that of partner in the business, and was by this time the possessor of one-tenth of the whole concern; for Mr. Bellingham was getting old, and glad to move more leisurely in the affairs of business on to more youthful shoulders. But Langlough's ambition at last overstepped his prudence, and led him to the act, when on the day stated the old man to give him his daughter's hand in marriage—his daughter, who was so passionately attached, and would soon have been the happy wife of Langlough. to call her own. The old man's reply, as soon as amazement would permit him to speak, was peremptory refusal, accompanied by some disparaging remarks on the vileness of Matthew's origin, and followed up by the intimation that Langlough should retain his confidential post no longer, but be put back to the position of an ordinary assistant in the establishment, by which means they should be brought more frequently into contact, when Matthew would be sure to get over his foolish fancy. THE MILITARY COMMISSION ENGAGED IN THE TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS AT WASHINGTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER.]

THE CONSPIRATORS AND THE CONSPIRACY.

We omitted in our last number any account of the Conspiracy trial going on at Washington, because we did not deem the proceedings of sufficient importance. We recur to the subject this week, and give portraits—drawn from photographs taken by GARDNER, of Washington—of six of the conspirators, viz.: of PAYNE, ATZEROTT, HAROLD, SPANGLER, O'LAUGHLEN, and ARNOLD. We also give on page 408 portraits of the members composing the military court engaged in the trial.

There has been further evidence offered to prove the connection of the rebel authorities with the burning of steamboats on the Western rivers. But as these efforts were directed against Government vessels, the evidence in its relation to the assassination of President LINCOLN does not have any especial importance. The same may be said of the evidence proving that the City Point explosion was due to rebel agency.

On Friday, June 17, a curious bit of evidence was offered, going to prove that the Daily News, the rebel organ in New York city, has been supported during the war in a great measure by the Richmond authorities. This was no surprise when it was considered that recently, upon the close of the war, JOHN MITCHELL, the editor of the Richmond Enquirer, had been invited to take the editorial charge of the News and had accepted. The evidence is perfectly reliable, coming from the assistant manager of the Montreal bank, and proves that a check for $70,000 was last August drawn from rebel deposits and in favor of BENJAMIN WOOD, the proprietor of the News.

In connection with the events relating to the assassination, the portrait, which we give on page 412 of Mr. FREDERICK SEWARD will be of unusual interest to our readers.

GENERAL LEE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

GENERAL LEE'S Head-quarters at Petersburg, the ruins of which are illustrated on page 404, were at the house of Mr. TURNBULL, grandson of PETER JOYES, founder of Petersburg, and chief magistrate of the county. LEE so little expected the results of the attack upon his lines that he had scarcely time to get away. A good deal of fighting took place in the vicinity of the house, but whether it was burned by the troops or the shells is not certain. Our men advanced beyond it, threw up a line of rifle-pits, and held the ground till the evacuation.

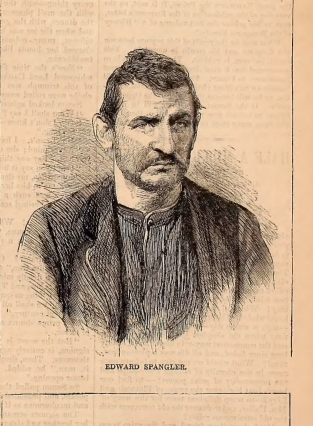
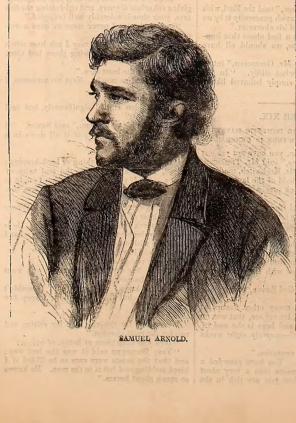
PRINCE NAPOLEON'S SPEECH AT AJACCIO.



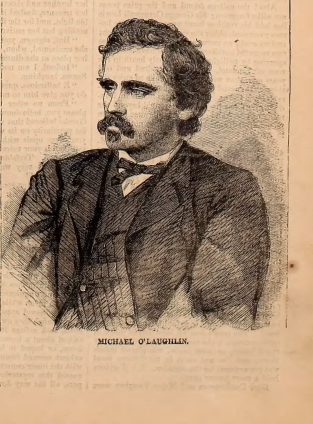
THE recent speech of Prince NAPOLEON at Ajaccio, in Corsica, the birth-place of the first NAPOLEON, is the momentous event of the day. The occasion upon which this speech was made was in itself an interesting epoch to Frenchmen. A monumental statue of the great NAPOLEON was to be uncovered. For two generations NAPOLEON had been the French idol—as WASHINGTON is the idol of Americans. For an idea to gain absolute control over Frenchmen it had only been necessary to pronounce it Napoleonic. Within a few years the prestige of that omnipotent name had raised LOUIS NAPOLEON first to the Presidency and thence to the throne. With the assumption of the crown LOUIS had become an ardent advocate of imperialism. Chiefly because Imperialism was peculiarly adapted to his purposes. Only recently he had brought from the commencement of the Christian era a type for the reconstruction of the political system of the nineteenth century. That type was Cæsarism. To render Imperialism and Cæsarism more palatable to Frenchmen he had sought to invest them with Napoleonic sanctity.

Just here, and at the most opportune occasion, he was encountered by Prince JEROME, also a scion of NAPOLEON, though not wielding the imperial sceptre nor wearing the purple. It was a matter of common remark that the Prince bore a striking resemblance to the elder NAPOLEON, while the Emperor had not the least trace of any such likeness in his features. Prince JEROME ventured much, it might seem, in daring to confront the Emperor upon topics which were so vital. So much the more heroic then was the act. If the Prince had made his utmost endeavor he could scarcely have put himself in an attitude of greater antagonism with his imperial cousin than he did in this remarkable speech.



But what did Prince NAPOLEON say at Ajaccio that the world should so much wonder at? In the first place, he dared to pronounce the Napoleonic idea to be essentially Democratic. But whatever he may have thought of NAPOLEON he certainly left no possible room for doubt as to his own leanings. He spoke of Democracy as of something certain to be ultimately successful the world over. He even ventured to point with triumph to the war which the American Republic had for four years waged against aristocracy, and the glorious result of that war as a token of the times. He opposed LOUIS'S Mexican policy, and spoke with favor of the MONROE doctrine. Is it any wonder that the expression of such ideas by a Prince of the blood startled the imperial court? Why, here was treason by the wholesale—a pregnant fountain of treason and perhaps of revolution!

This speech, though its effect has been so startling, was no sudden outburst on the Prince's part. He expressed only what he was already known to believe and feel. If he spoke with more than his wonted boldness, it was because the course which events had taken on the American continent had so completely vindicated his political creed. Yet his speech was a surprise—and to no one more so than to the Emperor. LOUIS had thought to bridle the Prince's tongue, and to insure his subordination by making him Vice-President of the Council of State. JEROME did not feel the obligation, and when his best opportunity offered he made the best use of it.



The Emperor's reception of the speech was just what might have been expected. In a letter to the Prince he addressed the latter somewhat bitterly. The Emperor had left the Prince, during his own absence, near the persons of the Empress and the Prince Imperial, hoping that his presence, conduct, and discourse would testify to the union reigning in the royal family. The Prince, he said, had abused this confidence by proclaiming, under the aegis of the FIRST NAPOLEON, a political programme which could be offered to the enemies of his Government. The Prince should not attempt to apply to the present time the ideas of NAPOLEON, because he had not fitted himself to do so by passing "through the severe trials in the responsibility of power." Indeed how was he competent "to estimate the true value the great historical figure of NAPOLEON?" But in one respect there could be no doubt as to NAPOLEON'S ideas. He had founded a monarchy to keep his family in subordination. "From the same rule of conduct," says LOUIS, in conclusion, "I can not henceforth deviate."

The Prince replied briefly that, in consequence of LOUIS'S letter, he should resign the Vice-Presidency of the Privy Council and the Presidency of the Commission of Universal Exhibition of 1867. The Prince's letter is not that of a subject and friend, but has the manner of a peer addressing a peer. It was, moreover, so hastily published that it is quite possible that LOUIS read it for the first time in the columns of La Presse. Nothing could show more clearly that the rupture is complete. Moreover, the Prince, against the wishes of the Empress, insisted upon publishing his Ajaccio speech in the form of a pamphlet.

That portion of the Legislative Corps which is most friendly to the Emperor, immediately after the publication of his letter to the Prince, left Napoleon at the Tuileries as a token of their satisfaction.

Notwithstanding LOUIS'S desire to monopolize the great NAPOLEON the Prince, it is said, on the very day of the publication of the Emperor's letter, sent to his printer the first volume of a "History of the Bonaparte Family."

What may be the result of this rupture between the Emperor and his cousin is uncertain. But much, however, is evident. The antagonism is so pronounced that it must develop some issue of great importance to France. For either the Prince will become an unwilling victim of the imperial despotism, or he will become the leader of the Opposition party. If the former, then there will be no restraint to LOUIS'S power; if the latter, then LOUIS will have many steps to retrace in his political career.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LIMON.

"IT is good to be merry and wise," saith an old song; but every man can not be a laughing philosopher, although it is comparatively easy to be either merry or wise "upon occasion," it is supremely difficult to be both at the same time. The two conditions mix almost as reluctantly as oil and water, and youth seldom makes even an effort to combine them. Happy youth, whose best wisdom it is, after all, to be merry while it may! Which of us would not gladly barter this bitter wisdom of later years for the sweet simplicity—nay, is single day—of that happy thoughtless time when the simplest jest provoked a laugh, and the commonest way-side flower had a beauty long since faded, and all life was a pleasant carnival? What would we not give to believe once more in the chimney of college friendship and the immortality of prize poems?—to feel our hearts beat high over the pages of Plutarch and Livy?—to weep delicious tears for the woes of Mrs. Haller, and to devour the old romances with the old omnivorous relish?

Alas! the College friend and the prize poem are alike forgotten; Sir George Cornwall Lewis has laid his ruthless hand upon our favorite heroes; our smiles shine the very name of Rochester, and we could no more revive our interest in those two mounted cavaliers who might have been seen sparring by twilight across a lonely heath in the West of England, some two hundred and odd years ago, than we could undertake to ride the thirteen thousand pages of Mademoiselle Scudéry's Grand Cyrus. Ay, that pleasant dream is indeed over! Even its joys are "lodg'd beyond the reach of fate," and of the remembrance of them no man can disinherit us. Have we not all lived in Arcadia?

Wisdom apart, however, what more commendable merriment may there be than a dinner at Richmond when the year and the guests are young, and the broad landscape lies steeped in sunshine, and the afternoon air is sweet with new-mown hay, and the laugh follows the jest as quickly and gayly as the frothing Champagne follows the popping of the cork? Now and then a tiny skiff with one white sail skims down the molten gold of the broad river. The plump islands and the wooded dells look hazy in the tender mist of sunset. A pleasant sound of gay voices and chinking glasses finds its way now and then from the open window below, or the adjoining balcony; and, perhaps, the music of a brass band comes to us from the lower town, harmonized by distance.

Thus bright and propitious was it on the eventful day of Saxon's "little dinner;" and care had been taken by his friends that every detail of the entertainment should be as faultless as the weather itself. The guests had all been driven down in open carriages; the costliest dinner that money could procure, and taste devise, was placed before them; and the best room in the house could have been pre-engaged for the occasion. It had seldom held a more joyous party.

Lord Castletowers and Major Vaughan were there of course, having run up from Surrey for the day; Sir Charles Burgoyne, serenely insolent; the Hon. Edward Brandon, with his hair standing up like the wig of an electrified doll, from inward excitement and outward rubbing; Mr. Lawrence Greatorex, looking, perhaps, somewhat abstracted from time to time, but talking fluently; two other Etrechteum men, both very young and prone to laughter, and both highly creditable to their tailors and bootmakers; and last, though not least, the Graziana and her party. The latter, with their misfortunes, never come alone. Like Scottish chieftains they travel with a "raill," and have an embarrassing addition to their following that unvitied "raill" on all kinds of inconvenient occasions. In the present instance, Mrs. Trefalden of the day had contented herself with only two sisters and a brother; and her young host not only welcomed them with all his honest heart, but thought it very kind and condescending on her part to bring them at all. The brother was an gloomy youth, who said little, ate a great deal, and watched the company in a furtive manner over the rim of his wine-glass. The sisters were tall, blackeyed little souls, who giggled, blushed, fired, and drank Champagne incessantly. As for the prima donna herself, she was a fine, buxom, laughter-loving creature of about twenty years of age, as little like a Juno, and as much like a grown-up child as it is only possible for a Neapolitan woman to be. She had the majestic enough upon the stage, or in the green-room; but she never carried her dignity beyond the precincts of the dressing-room. She put it on with her rouge, and left it in her dressing-room with the rest of her theatrical wardrobe when the evening's work was done. She laughed at every thing that was said whether she understood it or not; and was delighted with every thing—with the drive, with the horses, with the mail phaeton, with the weather, with the dinner, with the guests, and with her host: and when the ice was brought to table—a magnificent, many-colored triumph of art—she clapped her hands like a child at sight of a twelfthcake.

"Now's the time for the bracelet, Saxon," whispered Lord Castletowers, when the wreck of this triumph was removed, and the sideboards were rolled away for dessert.

Saxon looked puzzled.

"What shall I say?" said he.

"Oh, I don't know—something graceful and not too long."

"But I can't. I haven't an idea."

"Never mind; she wouldn't understand it if you had. Say any thing, you know."

"Can't you say it for me?"

"Impossible, my dear fellow! I might as well ask me to kiss her for you."

Which was such a tremendous supposition, that Saxon blushed scarlet, and had not a word to say in reply.

"Ah, traditor! Why do you speak secrets?" said the prima donna, with a pout.

"Because he is a conspirator, signora," replied the Earl.

"A conspirator? Cielo!"

"It is quite true," said Burgoyne promptly. "There's a deadly mine of cracker powder in the room below, and Saxon and I are going to say something so sparkling that it will fire the train, and we shall all be blown into the middle of the next century."

The prima donna sang a roulade expressive of terror.

"But the worst is yet to come. This plot, signora, is entirely against yourself," said Castletowers. Then, dropping his voice, "Out with it, man," he added, "the gentleman's have a better opening."

So Saxon pulled the morocco case out of his pocket, and presented it with as much confusion and incoherence as if it had been a warrant.

The signora seemed slightly puzzled, invoked her brother and sisters, flew to the window with her treasure, flashed it to and fro in every possible light, and for the first few minutes could talk nothing but her native patois.

"But, signore, you must be a great prince!" she exclaimed, when, at length, she returned to her place at the dinner-table.

"Indeed, I am nothing of the sort," replied Saxon, laughing.

"E bellissimo, questo braccioletto! But why do you give him to me?"

"From no other reason than my desire to please you, bella donna," replied Saxon. "The Greeks believed that the opal had power to confer popularity on its wearer; but I do not offer you these opals with any such motive. Your talisman is your voice."

"Bene, Trefalden!" laughed the Earl. "That was very well said. Comme l'esprit vient aux filles!"

"A neat thing spoiled," muttered Greatorex, to his next neighbor. "He should have praised the eyes. Always praise the features."

"And do you suppose she doesn't know all about her eyes, too?" asked his neighbor—who happened to be Major Vaughan.

"No doubt; but then a woman is never tired of being admired for her beauty. The smallest particle of praise is as acceptable to her, in a way, as a holocaust of incense. But as to her voice, c'est autre chose. What is one compliment more or less after the loud applauses of the finest audience in Europe?"

In the mean while the two young Etrechteum men, oppressed apparently by the consciousness of how much they owed to their boots and waistcoats, took refuge in each other's society, and talked about a horse. Neither of them kept a horse, or hoped to keep a horse; and yet the subject seemed broad enough to have occult way with the inner consciousness of both: They discussed this mysterious animal in solemn whispers, all the way down from London to Richmond; alluding to him despondingly during dinner; and exchanged bets upon him in a moody and portentous manner at dessert. Apart from this overwhelming topic they were light-hearted young fellows enough; but the horse was their Nemesis, and rode them down continually.

As for the "raill," it went to work as vigorously upon the dessert as upon the twelve preceding courses. The plump sisters evidently looked upon Moet as pure Pierian, and had eaten Pope's advice to heart; while the gloomy brother, instead of taking to Manzanilla, seemed only intent on provisioning himself against a long journey. But even the best of dinners must end, and coffee came at last. Then out of the Etrechteum young men, emboldened by sparkling Champagne, found courage to speak. She laughed, and shook her head: but the assembled company looked aghast.

"I can not," said she. "My voice is a bird in one little cage, and my impressario guards the key."

Sir Charles Burgoyne darted a dreadful glance at the offender.

"My dear lady," he said, "pray do not say a word. You will know, or ought to know, that your operatic contract forbids any thing of the kind; and even if it were not so, we should not presume to ask so great a favor. It is entirely a mistake—a great mistake—on the part of this young gentleman."

"I—I am very sorry," stammered the unlucky neophyte.

"And I am sorry," said the songstress, good-naturedly, "I should sing for you if I dared."

"Thou must not think of it, sorellina," interposed her brother, in his rapid Neapolitan. "Remember the penalty."

"The Signora Graziana must do nothing to offend the proprietors of the Castletowers, who was familiar with every dialect of the Italian.

"Certainly not," exclaimed Saxon. "Not for the world."

Then, turning to Burgoyne, he whispered, "What is it all about? Why should he be offended because she sang for us?"

"He would have me pay him one hundred pounds," said the prima donna, whose ears were quick.

"A hundred pounds fine, you know," explained Burgoyne. "'Tis in his bond, and the man's a very Shylock with his ducats."

Saxon laughed aloud.

"Is that all?" said he. "Oh, never mind, bella donna—I'll pay him his hundred pounds, and welcome."

And so a plan was formed in another room, and the Graziana sang to them divinely, not one song but a dozen.

"I fancy I hear friend the impressario may not hear of it, after all," said Mr. Greatorex, when the music was over, and they were preparing to return to town.

"Let us all take a solemn oath of secrecy," suggested Sir Charles Burgoyne.

But Saxon would not hear of it.

"No, no," said he. "The fine has been fairly forfeited, and shall be fairly paid. Let no man's soul be burdened with a secret on my account. I will send Shylock his check to-morrow morning. Ladies, the carriages are at the door."

"I had heard that our Amphitryon did not know the meaning of fear," said Mr. Greatorex, as they went down stairs, "and now I believe it. Why this little affair, my lord, take it from first to last, will not have set to the tune of something like five hundred pounds!"

"Well, I suppose it has," replied Castletowers, "including the bracelet."

"A modern Timon—eh?"

"Nay, I hope not. A modern Mæcenas, if you like. It is a name of better augury."

"I fear he dispenses his gold more after the fashion of Timon than of Mæcenas," replied the banker, dryly.

"He is a splendid fellow," said the Earl, with enthusiasm; "and his only impecuniosity is by no means the noblest part of his character."

"But he behaved like a fool about that hundred-pound fine, of course, we should all have kept the secret, and—"

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Greatorex," interrupted the Earl, somewhat stiffly. "In my opinion, Mr. Trefalden simply behaved like a man of honor."

CHAPTER XIX.

MR. TREFALDEN ON THE DOMESTIC MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF LAWYERS IN GENERAL.

"So, my young cousin, you have not yet lost all your primitive virtues," said Mr. Trefalden, as Saxon, attended by Mr. Jarrick, made his appearance on the threshold of the lawyer's private room at eight o'clock precisely on Monday evening.

"I hope I have parted from none that I ever possessed," replied Saxon; "but to what particular virtue do you allude?"

"To your punctuality, young man. You are as true to time as on that memorable morning when you breakfasted together at Reichenau, and you tasted Lunate for the first time. You have become tolerably familiar with the flavor since then."

"Indeed I have," replied Saxon, with a smile and a sigh.

"And with a good many other flavors as well, I imagine. Why, let me see, that was on the seventh of March, and here is the end of the third week in April—scarcely eight weeks ago, Saxon?"

"It seems like eight centuries."

"I dare say it does. You have crowded a vast number of impressions into a very short space of time. But then you are rich in the happy adaptability of youth, and can bear the shock of revolution."

"I try to bear it as well as I can," replied Saxon, laughingly. "It isn't very difficult."

"No—the lessons of pleasure and power are soon learned; and, by-the-way, the art of dress also. You are quite a swell, Saxon."

The young fellow's face crimsoned.

"You could not get over that awkward habit of blushing, do what he would.

"I hope not," he said. "I am what fate and my tailor have made me. Can I possibly look me to his own man, and he has done as he liked with me."

"So that, to paraphrase the kingly state, your virtues are your own, and your shortcomings are your tailor's? Nay, don't look uncomfortable. I am very well dressed; but I am not well dressed—which, to my thinking, is precisely as a gentleman should be."

"I don't wish to be a 'swell,'" said Saxon.

"Nor are you one. And now tell me something about yourself. How do you like this new life?"

"It bewilders me," said Saxon. "It dazzles me. It takes my breath away. I feel as if London were a huge circus, all dust, and roar, and glitter, and I being carried round it, in a great chariot race. It frightens me sometimes—and yet I enjoy it. There is so much to enjoy!"

"But you thought it a dreary place at first," said Mr. Trefalden, with his quiet smile.

"Because I was a stranger, and knew no one —because the very roar and flow of life along the streets made me solitude the heavier. But that's all changed now, thanks to you."

"Thanks to me, Saxon?"

"Of course. Don't I owe that dear fellow Castletower's acquaintance to you? And if I hadn't known him, how should I have got into the Etrechteum? How should I have known Burgoyne, and Greatorex, and Brandon, and Fitz-Hugh, and the Dalton, and all the other fellows? And they are so kind to me—it's perfectly incredible how kind they are, and what trouble they take to oblige and please me!"

"Indeed?" said the lawyer, dryly.

"Yes, that they do; and I should be worse than ungrateful if I did not like a place where I have so many friends. Then again, I have so much to do—so much to think of—so much to learn. Why, it would take half a lifetime only to see all the picture-galleries in London, and study the Etruscan vases in the British Museum!"

Mr. Trefalden could not help laughing.

"You droll boy!" said he. "Do you mean to tell me that you divide your attentions between pretty prima donnas and cinerary urns?"

"I mean that I was in the Etruscan room for three hours this morning, and that we have a tazza at Rotzberg of a kind of which you have not a single specimen in the collection—red, with red bases relievi. What do you say to that?"

"That I would not give five farthings for all the old pottery in Europe."

"Yes you would, if you once learned to look upon it as history. Now the pottery of Etruria—"

"My dear Saxon," interposed Mr. Trefalden, "as you are going to be married, I advise you to pottery of Etruria, and tell me a little more about yourself. You are learning to ride, are you not?"

"Yes, I can ride pretty well already; and I have a fencing lesson every other morning, and I am learning to drive. But I don't get on quite so well with the whip as with the foils. I have an awkward habit of looking my wheels with my people's, and getting in the wrong side of the road."

"Awkward habits indeed," said Mr. Trefalden; "especially in Rotten Row."

"And—and I am learning to dance, also," said Saxon, with a shy laugh.

"In short, what with finishing your education, giving suburban dinners, and cultivating the fine arts, your time is tolerably well occupied."

"It is, indeed. I never seem to have a moment to spare."

"Humph! And pray may I ask how much money you have spent during these last three weeks?"

"I haven't the least idea."

"I suspected as much. Kept no accounts, I suppose?"

"None whatever."

Mr. Trefalden smiled significantly, but said nothing.

"I suppose it's very wrong," said Saxon. "I suppose I ought to have put it all down in a book?"

"Undoubtedly."

"But then I know nothing of book-keeping; indeed, I don't even know the real value of money. But if you will tell me what I ought to do, I will try. Gillingwater can help me, too. He knows."

"Gillingwater is your valet, is he not? Where did you hear of him?"

Greatorex recommended him to me. He is a most invaluable fellow. I don't know what I should do without him."

"And you have a groom, I suppose?"

"I have two grooms."

"Two? My dear boy, what can you want with more than one?"

"I don't know. Burgoyne said I couldn't do with less—but then, you know, I keep five horses."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; one for the cab, two for riding, and two for the mail phaeton."

"And you keep them at livery, of course?"

"Yes; Burgoyne said it was the best way; and that the beasts were sure to be ill-fed if I hired stabling and left it to the men. He knows so much about horses."

"Evidently. It was he who sold you that mare and cab, was it not?"

"To be sure it was; and then I have bought all the rest under his advice. I assure you, Osulph William, I don't believe any fellow ever had such friends!"

Mr. Trefalden coughed and looked at his watch.

"Well," he said, "we must not forget that I have brought you down here to-night, Saxon, for a serious conference. Shall we have some coffee first, to filter the dust from our brains?"

Whereupon, Saxon assenting, the lawyer rang the bell, and coffee was brought. In the mean while the young man had made the tour of the room, inspected the law-books on the shelves, examined the door of the safe, peeped out of the window, and ascertained the date of the map hanging over the fire-place. This done, he resumed his chair, and said, with more frankness than politeness:

"I'd as soon live in a family-vault as in this dismal place! Is it possible, cousin William, that you have no other home?"

"The greater part of my life is passed here," replied Mr. Trefalden, sipping his coffee, "I admit that the decorations are not in the highest style of art; but they answer the purpose well enough."

"And you actually live here, day and night, summer and winter?"

"Why no—not altogether. I have a dear little home, only five miles from town, in which I hide myself at night, like a beast of prey."

"It is a relief to my mind to know that," said Saxon. "I should like to see your wife. Why didn't you let me come to you there to-night?"

"Because you are not fat enough."

"Not fat enough?" repeated Saxon, laughing.

"I admit no man, unless to devour him. Lawyers are apt to get their fair share—and that den of mine is paved with the bones of slaughtered clients."

Saying which, Mr. Trefalden put an end to the subject by ringing the bell, and sending for Mr. Keckwitch.

"You can close the office and go, Keckwitch," said he. "I do not want you any more this evening."

Mr. Keckwitch looked at his employer with eyes that had no more speculation in them than if they had been boiled.

"I beg pardon, Sir," he replied, with husky placidity, "but perhaps you forget Rogers's case. I am bound to go through the papers to-night."

"Then you can take them home with you. I have private business with this gentleman, and wish to be alone—you understand? Alone."

A pale light flashed into Mr. Keckwitch's eyes—flashed and died, as he did not impart an agreeable expression to his countenance.

"And when you have put all straight, and turned off the gas, please to let me know, that I may lock the office door on the inside."

The head clerk retired without a word, followed by the same eye of his employer.

"If I were to become a rich man to-morrow," said he, with a bitter smile, "the first elegant superfluity in which I should indulge would be the kicking of that fellow all the way along Chancery Lane. It is a luxury that would be cheap at any price the court might award."

"If you have so bad an opinion of him, why do you keep him?" asked Saxon.

"For the reason that no one ever keeps an ache in a tooth. He is a useful grinder, and helps me to polish off the bones that I was telling you about just now."

Mr. Trefalden then saw his head clerk off the premises, locked the outer door, put up the fire, put the shade on the lamp (he always liked, he said, to spare his eyes), and drew his chair to the table.

LILACS.

CREESE and plumes of purple splendor,
Bright enough for queenly heads,
Gleaming with a light as tender
As the faint-flamed opal sheds.

Plumes and crests and nodding tassels
Swaying lightly in the breeze,
Banners hung from brave old castles
Can not match my lilac-trees.

There be many blossoms fairer,
And Maud thinks more worthy praise;
"Fewer lilacs, they were fairer,
Plenty makes them plain," she says.

Out upon the heartless fashion
That coins beauty but from gold;
Sweeter, truer far the passion
Poets in their songs have told.

For the beauty of profusion,
For the crowd with daisies pranked,
If it be a fond delusion,
For the glamour God be thanked!

God be thanked for all His treasure,
Coined in golden butter-cups;
Whence a thick deep draught of pleasure
And the bee his honey sups.

So, my lilacs, toss your feathers,
Purple as the faint-flushed East,
Purple as the violet weathers,
In my sight a royal feast.

Wave your plumes and odors sprinkle,
With your dews upon the air;
Bright the stars, though millions twinkle,
Many lilacs—and yet fair!

HISTORY OF A CARTE DE VISITE.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—Knowing you to be tenderhearted, ready to sympathize with the afflicted, and to comfort the sorrowing, I beg you to act as my amanuensis, that I may leave to the world a record of my eventful life. Being faded and worn, you will have to bear with me patiently, and curb my story as I am able to gasp it out. It may teach some of the careless a lesson, and show them that although our existence may seem to some length the process of our creation is neither uninteresting nor without trouble, and that we should not be despised, trod upon, and maltreated as we are.

We have heard that you human beings are created from dust. You seem to be satisfied with this, and neither trouble yourself about the kind of dust nor the matter from which it is made; therefore I shall go no further into the details of my creation than to say that I first saw light in the beautiful and extensive manufactory of Herr M. A. Steinbach, Fabricant de Papier Mâchedy, Prussia, as a piece of beautiful white paper. I need not tell you how I was pressed between hot rollers, sized, coloured, and then laid on the shelf and—yes, for sixty-nine other sheets maltreated in the same way; nor how we were nailed into a box with nails halfan-inch long that bore teeth from the point of the witnesses in the conspiracy case at Washington; nor of the long and tedious voyages across the tempestuous ocean, and the narrow escape I had from being thrown overboard in a storm—for all this you can imagine as well as I can describe it. I first saw light in this country at number fourteen Bond-street, Photographique. After the box I rested within was opened, I was taken from the company of the other four hundred and seventy-nine of my kind, shaken, held up to the light so the cruel artist could see "Steinbach" on my back, and then whirled up a winding-stair through rooms light and dark, and, terrified and alone, laid down. Presently I almost wished I had been left in the box, my curious substance neither sweet nor beautiful. I heard the artist say it was albumen, and that hundreds of diminutive bottles were ranged on the table of coming to life, as many matronly hens deprived of the care of an extensive brood, and myriads of small round files spread out before me like the field in the mouth of some courageous chick with a decent rivals after it full tilt, that this albumen might be brain ourselves in so close to her that we can hear our sturdy ship upon the sea. I trembled at such a fate, but presently he seized me by my corners, and put me in a pan of water, in which was a most disgusting surface, which convinced me that the eggs of which it was made must have been very bear-like creatures before their present hatch. Not content with this, he took a rounded rod and gently pressed me down in every place, to give me a thorough dose. He allowed me to remain about five minutes, and seeing me again threw me corner-wise over a round frame, which, I afterward learned, was allowed to collect my scattered thoughts, while the superfluous albumen scattered down my sides and slipped in a disgusting manner from my feet. Presently my four hundred and seventy-nine sisters were brought in, treated likewise, and when we were all dry, our corners were cut off, and we were put in a huge press, and squeezed in a manner so violent that my virtuous female would blush at the recollection. I was then put in a frame, looking rather obstreperous and indignant, I succeeded in getting one corner out, which the artist did not discover until when I was in the sun, and after that then he wickedly remarked that for my pains I should be the first sheet used, and the corner sticking out should be first exposed to the sun to prepare the negative, and then come after me. What is a negative? thought I, and concluded it was something to do with the dark room, which I had seen as I passed. Bellows and lenses, tubes and funnels, and other articles, were there in abundance, and all properly labelled, and in a special place where they could be found in a moment, without trouble. This enabled me to find out and tell you more than I should otherwise be able to do. After cleaning the plate, and brushing it over with a wide camel's-hair blender, the shining glass was seized by one of these gentlemen, and a coating of a very odoriferous nasty compound poured over it, and allowed to flow evenly over the surface, and the surplus run off at one corner into a bottle labelled "Collodion." This I got a bath in, which I could. It was quickly placed upon a long forked arrangement, and lowered into a dark box, which was labelled "Silver bath." When the glass was removed from the bath, it was quickly placed in another black-looking box, and after lying in the bath, and having a little door, which was shut so suddenly that I could not discover how the glass looked after the second bath had received it, the operator—as I am told such persons are called—seemed in great excitement, and ran out of the room with the whole affair. Then I heard the rumbling of wheels, the crying of children, ringing of bells, blowing of whistles, an occasional "Now!" "Look! look! look! look! look! look!" the whistling of birds, and several other strange noises, that quite overpowered me. Then I began to feel something dreadful had happened, until the operator returned to the dark room with a smile on his face. He opened the little door of the black box, and therefrom took my old friend the glass. It presented a most beautiful white and frost-like appearance, and was quite changed in its nature. From a bottle labeled "Developer" the operator poured a solution over the plate, and it immediately grew darker; presently faint lines could be discovered: now the fluid in a little dress, and immediately little hands and feet and faces; and, as if coming up from a mist, three beautiful children appeared seated close beside each other. After pouring this fluid on the negative, as it was called, it was well washed with water, and then the next fluid it up to the light, put their heads together, rubbed their hands over the back of it, looked through it, and finally concluded that it was hardly strong enough, and that they would have to re-develop it. So they took two bottles down from a shelf, and poured from them a mixture which they called re-developer over the negative, moving it from side to side until they said sufficient intensity was obtained. Then the plate was washed through another washing, and hoped they would get the poor thing fixed presently. Yes! when, sure enough, down came another bottle, nicely labeled "Fixing solution," which was poured over the negative, after which it was again washed, thoroughly dried, and another bath, labeled "Varnish" taken down, and its contents poured over the negative, when it was placed in a drying-rack, and I saw the more of it, as I was in the experiment of another glass plate. At this moment I felt quite relieved within myself, caused by seeing, as I supposed, that poor glass receive a little rest; but, alas! was not the case. Great excitement seemed to pervade overhead, and I saw my kindred sheets dragged away to the press. Then I was seized by unfortunate corner, and hurried up a flight or two of stairs into a very warm, dark room, and laid down upon a table where sat a pretty-white man, full of a very pretty colorless fluid, which was called Silvering Solution. This was precipitated, and the fifth was re-dissolved with it, ammonia, mixed with the other four-fifths, and the sediment dissolved with nitric acid. Presently I was taken up gently and carefully floated upon the surface of this beautiful solution for about a minute, which was more pressure than before was alarming to my results, than that offensive albumen. I was then removed, and hung lengthwise upon two terribly strong needles upon a frame, and then I dripped from my almost strangled self. I was then placed in a fearfully-close box, held tightly by two unfeeling clips until they were dry, and gas, that is, smoke, was poured in, and tried in vain to reach me with their fiery tongues, while I curled myself up in the most desperate and resolute manner. When tried perfectly, I was removed and hurried through another dark, mysterious passage, placed in a box, acted by machinery, and between clips, and there allowed to hang for five or ten minutes over a saucer of ammonia, which would have been a relief to my nerves under the fire, had it been so strong as to suffocate me, and deprive me of my senses to such an extent that I should not have found myself once out in fresh air and sunlight, pressed closely to, and face to face with, my old friend the negative of the day of my birth. Then I thought my man would occasionally separate us in part, and then quickly press us together again. Finally we were parted entirely, and I was taken to the cage and locked up. I was thrown into a dark drawer, only to be taken away in a few moments by a man with very black fingers. I was taken to stairs again, and there plunged me into a deep tank of water, vowing he would wash away some of my ugly self, and then let me go! I remained in the water for a few minutes, out of this generous bath I observed the image of the three children upon my surface precisely like that upon the negative. Much I must leave you to account for. After this I was put through what the dark-fingered man called a toning solution, plunged, washed again, and fixed in the same manner that the poor negative was fixed, and finally placed in a large tank of clear water for one hundred and ninety-five their best to squirt me out of existence. I succeeded in floating up in a corner of the tank, and in clinging to the side of it, which I found I now possessed. I am rapidly fading away in consequence, as they say I was not washed enough, and must soon expect to find myself in the fire. I was removed from the tank, and with a number of other victims run through a patent clothes-ringer, carried down stairs, my sides and edges trimmed, a smattering of pure flourine brushed over my back, placed upon a pure white mount, or card, by delicate female fingers, and laid aside to dry, which I now am. I was put through a crushing pairof rollers, a polish of white wax and turpentine rubbed over me, carefully laid aside and pronounced finished. Need I tell you more? How I was placed in the breast-pocket of a man of one hundred and forty-five darling ties, and their precious mother, to go defend his flag and their homes from the invader? How he kissed me and pressed me to his heart before and after battle, and how the hot tears often fell upon me? How the relentless bullet came along whispering death and destruction, and how it entered his noble breast and fell him to the earth? How his eager hands grasped me and held me before his eyes until they lost their power, and until his last prayer for them was sent to heaven? Need I tell you all this? Nay! the story is an old and never-to-be-forgotten one, so I will not repeat it; but simply add that I am fading away, the result of no bad manipulation, of which I was made by the best processes known—but of my refusing to be properly washed, which causes the fading away prematurely of many a person as well as many a carte de visite.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

THE EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.—A lady in very reduced circumstances, but who had once occupied a superior social position, has presented to the world leaves of the magnificent trees for which the forests of America are so celebrated, and which, when dried and pressed, are preserved in varying coloring even the foliage of tropical plants. The work of which we speak was placed in an album and sent to one of the crowned heads of Europe, a precisely similar copy being presented to the consort of the Emperor of the French. But the reception of the poor lady's gift was not the same in question was very different. From the first arrived an acknowledgment, penned by an official, stating that "par ordre" the sovereign "had condescended to accept the offering, which, however, it was hoped would not be considered as a precedent or encouragement for any future similar gift." From the second the donor had the infinite gratification of receiving a few lines from the pen of her Imperial Majesty, expressing her regret at the unhappy penury of the exposure contained in the album, "qu'elle trouvait ruineuse," and requesting the lady to accept the ring from the finger as a token of her "reconnaissance"—the value of the ring being £100; real-quaint versus genuine kindness of heart.

A REAL ROMANCE.—A curious scene of recognition is reported to have taken place at Geneva. A poor, wretchedlooking old woman went to a branch pawn-office there to pledge the only article of value left her—a small gold locket. The clerk scarcely looked at it ere he asked the owner where she had it from. She declared it was her own property, and it came out that the old woman found in the clerk her long-lost son. Many years ago, when this woman was keeping a farm of her own at Ruffel-Kirchen, in Hungary, her son was drawn as a soldier, and on his return heard the melancholy news that his mother's cottage had been burned down, that she had left the village soon after, and was probably dead. Then mother and son had lived with Vienna unknown to meeting, and it was only the locket that led to a recognition.

MEETING OF OLD ACQUAINTANCE.—In your intercourse with others never be in a hurry to jump to conclusions. Sometimes you are not at all different from what was expected. Hear the end of the following before you condemn. Two men were to be introduced by an incident. A gentleman entered a shop, and inquired for the proprietor, and with whom he was the previous man who entered yesterday."

On his arrival the gentleman said, "I am not sure that the correct change of the sovereign."

SECOND A.—"Oh, no! It was quite correct. I was very particular. I counted it out to you, and you saw that it was right."

GENTLEMAN.—"You are quite mistaken' and I shall expect to have it rectified."

SECOND A.—"We can not do any thing the matter now. You have objected, and I am sorry it was quite correct."

GENTLEMAN. "Are you sure?"

SECOND A.—"Quite sure, Sir."

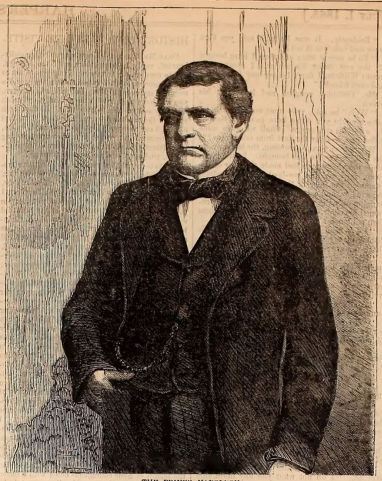
GENTLEMAN.—"Then I am not." I found on making up my cash that I had a half-sovereign too much; and, thought it best to call and tell you so. You are quite right. I wish you good-morning."

THERE are some civilized places where the produce of the Western States are collected to be sent to the Eastern and European markets, and some idea of the enormous surplus produce of the Western States may be gathered from the fact that from one of these places, Chicago, the following were sent East in one year, namely, 18,198,393 bushels of wheat; 44,860,984 bushels of corn; 12,836,373 bushels of oats, rye, and barley, 197,341 fat cattle, 1,321,691 hogs, 197,500 sheep, 1,205,000 lbs. of wool, 3,473,000 barrels of pork, 58,038,728 pounds of lard, 4,891,993 pounds of butter, and 3,651,000 pounds of cheese, besides other articles.

THE FRENCH IMPERIAL FAMILY AND THE CONFESSIONAL.—It seems that the Emperor of the French will not permit the Prince Imperial to go to confession to any of the other Roman Catholics find a comfort to their souls. There has been selected by the Emperor as the spiritual guide of the prospective heir to the throne, a member of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, who is to be the confessor and adviser of the Prince, and in the presence and hearing of a third person. No other questions are allowed.

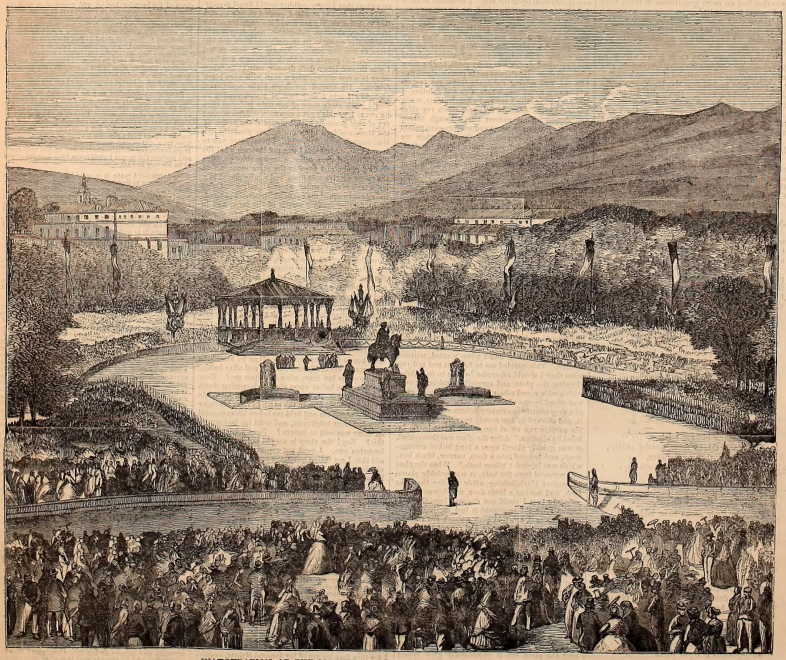
PUTTING THINGS IN ORDER.—Every body knows that we men owe an immense, ever-accumulating, and utterly irredeemable debt to the ladies. One of the principal ways in the gratitude due to them for putting our things to rights and keeping them so is by not disputing the assertion that we are, what should we do without their neat-handed solicitude? When I found that somebody had put the broken chess of the barber bureau, and contrasts it with the torn and tattered condition in which I usually see it, a very rare low arranged his shirts, handkerchiefs, and socks in the most exemplary style, I knew that it was not how the day when he emerged from the single state into double. Handsome! What! said Mrs. Partington, in her eminent virtuously "cream-laid," and guillotine of twist or wrinkle, the man steeple duly rounds his countenance, and that the impenetrable button ever in place. Looking back on the bachelor days of Mr. Partington, Mrs. P. has frankly blessed with a notable helpmeet pities from the bottom of her heart—but I am not sure that she is entirely unprejudiced.

PREJUDICE.—Prejudice may be compared to a misty morning in October: it can not be said to be dark, and can be seen at the summit of a neighboring hill a figure, apparently of gigantic stature, for every object seen medium through which he is viewed would make him appear; he goes down the hill and finds that the appearances toward him: the size lessens as they approach; they draw still nearer, and the mist through which he viewed is gradually, but sensibly, diminished; at last they meet, and perhaps the person he had taken for a monster proves to be his own brother.



MANNERS.—"I make it a point of morality," says a writer, "to study the manners of those with whom I associate. They may be awkward or graceful, blunt or polite; polished or rustic, but whatever they are if the man seems well, and acts from honest intentions without eccentricity or affectation. All men have not the manners of good society, as it is called, to school themselves in all its fastidious rules and observances, and if there be a standard of manners, it is well founded on reason and good sense, and not upon the conventions of fashion. Manners, like conversation, should be extemporaneous, and not studied. I always suspect a man of deception who has some purposeful smile on his face, the same bending of the body, and the same inclination of the head. One has the eye on the hearty—it may be rough—grip of the hand, the careless nod of recognition, and genuine expression, the homely but welcome salutation—'How are you, my old friend?'"

THE English poor vary so much among themselves, the North of England is so different from the South, the inhabitant of the town are so unlike the inhabitants of rural districts that any general propositions about the English poor are sure to be untrue. Nevertheless it is widely, but, speaking with the latitude which the subject forces on us, we may say that the English peasant is one of the English poor in that their condition is arranged on the same sort of leaving system as take care of them. In this sense more than any other England is an aristocratic country. The comfort of the poor, as it depends on the nobility is, comparatively speaking, very superficial. It is honorable to the nobility that it is superficial; it is convenient to have a nobleman to take the chair at public meetings; it is for the interest of the poor that everybody have an indisputable right to walk out of and into rooms where other people are, but all this is the outside of life. The true life, the intellectual life, the spiritual life, the moral life of a peasant depends on the intelligence of its owner to appreciate and be cured with a wish to have great poets and great writers. The poor have an aristocracy over them which it is supposed Heaven intended to guide them, to save them from the rocks ahead. The owner of the land, the clergyman, all benevolent laymen, and above all the wealthy merchant or tea, are an aristocracy set over the poor. It is the duty of this aristocracy to be kind, charitable, and to set a good example. It is the duty of the poor to be obedient, industrious, humble, and contented. But how few of the many fall short of the ideal; but the ideal exists for each, and the persuasion is deeply rooted in the mind of all the members of the upper classes that this relation of the poor and the rich was ordained by God, and that it is as long as comparatively right and good that any other relation must be wrong and dangerous. Of course it is impossible. Other people may try to get on, but the poor must be content with the station in which God has placed them, and the lines. The whole Catechism, so far as it is moral and not religious, is summed up in the duties of the poor and the rich, and the theory of their existence. And almost all modern literature, and especially all that is popular, is of a contrary tendency. Instead of teaching the duties of respectability and contentment, it teaches the duties of repudiation on this theory in every aspect.



"IT is true bliss, he'll never stain," is a saying of which Fielding remarks: "Coventry had formerly the reputation for giving blues, so much that 'true blue' came to be a proverb, signifying one that is always the same. Blue was formerly a color appropriated to the dresses of servants, and persons in low life." You ground varlet, you need not be ashamed to wear the white your master is one of your fellows." It was also the color of beadles, perhaps the reason for the old saying, 'as true as beadle.' It is now applied to a certain party in politics." From this we learn what Fielding knew nothing of our famous blue-stockings.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

THE Impératrice Régente has revived the taste for plain dresses, with paletots to match, for out-door wear; and, in accordance with the example set by her Majesty, the foulard again occupies the first rank for summer toilets. It is employed for dresses, for jupons, and even for chemisettes. The entire plain white costume, with colored silk trimmings (as depicted in our first illustration) is very elegant; but the trimming may be dispensed with by the selection of a foulard with black, blue, or rose spots. The same designs in muslin, already published, will furnish agreeable wear for June and the succeeding warm months. For walking dress the system of ferettes has been almost abandoned; but, where still persevered in, the skirt should be allowed to train before entering a salon.

Two descriptions of bonnets, the chapeau empire and the chapeau fanchon, are now struggling for supremacy. A design of each will be found in our engraving. The latter enjoys the vogue at present; but its simplicity, and the facility with which it is procured by all classes of the community, threaten the duration of its success, and pave the way for the triumph of the chapeau empire, which is more complicated, and better suited to persons of regular features. For the moment, both styles are accepted, and both are in accordance with the actual taste for very small bonnets. Some very pretty ornaments for chapeaux have just been brought out: long, sparkling grass in the place of bavolets for the fanchon bonnets, and crystal ornaments for those of the empire. The ribbons behind have completely gone out of fashion, and are replaced by a small scarf in white or black tulle, forming, as it were, a sort of double veil, falling a little below the neck, thus hidden as by a long bavolet.

White jaconos, with white stockings, are gradually returning into favor, except when colored flounces are worn; in the latter case the stockings should form a contrast as to color. Another excellent mode, when dresses are made to draw up, is to wear a jupon of the same material. The effect is somewhat less showy, certainly, but the object sought to be attained, the preservation of the robe, is thereby assured, without necessitating that appearance of coquetry which is disagreeable to many ladies.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Carriage Dress.—Robe of white foulard, ornamented throughout with straight silk trimmings, which contrast admirably with the dull white of the foulard. The small pelerine is trimmed with the same design, but more scarcely in a lesser proportion. White tulle chapeau rayon, decorated with bridge roses and rose-buds and pearl, relieved behind with a large bow and two wide bands of white tarlatane.

Fig. 2. Evening Dress for a Young Lady.—Nankeen-colored silk robe, elegantly trimmed with deep-cut silk ruching round the skirt, on the shoulders, and in two rows on the sleeves in the form of pouches. The corsage is plain, buttoning in front, and fastened at the waist with a narrow red velvet band terminated by a rosette. The vide-poche a few red velvet ornaments are introduced, and, with the Prince sleeve, form a forehead and the hunch of curls behind, produce a very pleasing ensemble.

Fig. 3. Visiting Dress.—The principal feature of this costume is the pelerine cut en chevalier, black silk muslin, edged throughout its entire outline with lace trimming. The material of the muslin is so designed as to show a portion of the corsage in front and behind. Worn over a violet dress can be very charming the effect is very gracful. Violet crape chapeau fanchon, trimmed with white lace ruching, and in front with one white and two violet flowers.

ARRANDALE & CO., Manufacturers' Agents, No. 107 Broadway, cor. Liberty street, New York. Only one dollar of goods will be sold for One Dollar Each.

In a public exhibition of the products of trade in the manufacturing districts of England, through the war having cut off the supply of cotton, a large quantity of Bayside Jewelry, originally intended for the English market, has been sent over to the United States, and will be SOLD AT ANY SACRIFICE!

Under these circumstances ARRANDALE & CO., acting as Agents for the principal European Manufacturers, have received upon a Special Contract a consignment, to be divided according to the following regulations:

On receipt of the certificate you will see what you are to have, and then send the Dollar, and the article or not. What the "Press" say of us.

GREAT GIFT DISTRIBUTION.—A rare opportunity is offered for obtaining a valuable present, diamond rings, watches, etc., by Messrs. ARRANDALE & Co., at No. 107 Broadway. They advertise to sell articles, worth from $5 to $100 value, and all are offered at one dollar each. The curiosity is heightened by the circumstance that on receipt of a certain article, enclosed in an envelope, and are not required to pay one dollar more than the price at which the article, which will certainly be worth more than that amount, will be sold to them. This is certainly a novel mode of investing a dollar.—Sunday Times, N. Y. City, Feb. 19, 1865.

Messrs. Arrandale & Co. have long been personally known as one of the most reliable firms in the city, worthy of public confidence.—N. Y. Scottish American Journal, Union Square.

We have inspected at the office of Arrandale & Co's Agency the most beautiful and extensive lot of a large assortment of fashionable and valuable jewelry of the newest pattern. We also noticed a large number of gold watches, and understand that the whole of these newly-imported articles are to be disposed of on a new system, giving great advantages to buyers, and affording extensive employment to agents. We know the house to be one of very respectable and thoroughly worthy of public confidence, and commend our readers to read their advertisement.—N. Y. Albion, Sept. 5, 1864.

By James Arrandale's arrangement the advantage must be on the side of the customer, for he has every thing to gain and nothing to lose.—Courier, Dec. 10. He knows what he will get for his dollar beforehand, and he need not send it if he is not satisfied.—N. Y. Sunday Atlas, Dec. 4, 1864.

ENTERPRISE FOR LADIES.—The most eligible and profitable employment we have heard of for ladies is the sale of certificates for the "Great Gift Distribution" of Arrandale & Co. A lady of our acquaintance has been very successful in the sale of these, and has, for over a year, but also in doing a good turn to those to whom she sold the Certificates, as will be seen by the following statement. Gentlemen can also be thus engaged.—N. Y. Sunday Mercury, Atlas & Argus.

In our columns the reader will find an advertisement of Arrandale & Co's Gift Distribution of watches, jewelry, and silverware. In payment of that advertisement we received specimens of the jewelry advertised, and will be warranted in saying that, both in finish and quality, they are equal, if not superior to, those represented. True Democrat (Lewistown, August 31, 1864.

The British Whig of Kingston, C. W., say, Nov. 26, that one of their subscribers received a package from Arrandale & Co., and by request brought some twenty articles, each purporting to be worth fifty cents or a dollar, and without hesitation we can state that each and all of the articles were worth all the money out of cost to the recipient, and some of them six times.

We have seen some very pretty specimens of Table and Tea Spoons, Gold Watches, Ladies' Chains, Pins, Brooches, etc., which have been sent by Arrandale & Co. to this place for $1 each.—Angelica Reporter, N. Y. State, Feb. 15, 1865.

AGENTS.—We want agents in every regiment, and in every town and county in the country, and those acting as such will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided the money accompanies the order. Single copy, will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to the sender in cash or postage stamps.

Brandreth's Pills

A GENERAL ASSISTANT OF Nature.

What is health? What is disease?

Health is when the supply and expenditure are equal. Disease, when the supply and expenditure are unequal.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS impart certain exquisite powers to all matters in the body where life is below the standard of the surrounding parts, or which have remained longer than the time Nature designed. So, in fevers and all that class of cases which soon run into mortification, BRANDRETH'S PILLS have marvelous curative qualities. Stimulate are contracted changing, and it is by this change we live. Should matter remain in organs beyond the time Nature designed, pain and inflammation set in, which is nothing more than a preparatory effort for our good. All Brandreth's Pills are supposed from the results to do is simply Assisting these Efforts of Nature.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it. B. BRANDRETH, is white letters.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IX.—No. 445.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PEACE—FOURTH OF JULY, 1865.

HYMN FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY, 1865.

GREAT God of Battles, unto Thee
Lift we our feeble voices high;
Eternal Ruler of the sky,
To whom all nations bend the knee!

With grateful hearts, O Lord, to-day
We bow before Thy throne above;
We know Thou art the God of Love,
Though veiled in cloud Thy hidden way—

Though veiled in cloud to our weak sight,
In Thy exalted wisdom sealed
To highest things; if clos revealed
Our eyes were blinded by the light.

Through tribulation, gracious Lord,
With hearts by grief and suffering torn,
Do we approach Thee, having borne
The fiery trial of the sword.

From Thy high throne within the skies
Look down, great God, upon our land:
Behold our altars how they stand
Wet with the blood of sacrifice!

Bless unto us this day, whose birth
First dawned upon that great decree
Whose stirring words proclaimed us free—
A sovereign people of the earth!

Bless Thou our land! From east to west
Make fruitful all the teeming soil:
Bless to the farmer his hard toil:
Our harvests, Lord, O make them blest!

Bless Thou our rulers! May they serve
With high wisdom to fulfill
Thy purpose: give them strength of will,
And power of brain, and iron nerve.

Bless, Lord, our people! Make them Thine,
As in Thy sacred-Word we're told
Were Israel's in the days of old.
O make us as a fruitful vine!

Bless Thou the Union! May its cause
Be Thine, O Lord, through good and ill;
Firm fixed upon the people's will,
And kept inviolate by the laws.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1865.

THE FOURTH OF JULY, 1865.

ONCE more the flag of the United States floats supreme over every inch of its rightful domain, from the pine hills of Maine to the palm shores of the Gulf, and from one ocean to the other. Four years ago it fell at Fort Sumter upon a startled people, doubting if they were a nation. It rises again over the strongest nation upon the globe. The great national festival returns, and will be hailed as never before. Eloquence and song and solemn and popular enthusiasm will consecrate the memorable day. The bells and the cannon of a continent will salute its happy sunrise and evening; and the universal public and private prayer of all true hearts will be, God bless and preserve the United States of America!

Eighty-nine years ago our fathers declared a popular government to be practicable. They asserted that such a government would be adequate to every emergency, signally prosperous in peace, and invincible against tyrannon or foreign war. Favored by every felicitous influence of situation, of climate, and of moderate population, the great experiment began. That it was an experiment the Old World insisted. That with a kind climate and spare population it might avail so long as there was peace, was contemptuously conceded. But that it would yield to the first serious pressure, and disappear in war, was haughtily asserted.

It was called an experiment, and it was more so than was believed. It claimed to be a trial of the principle of popular government, but it was not a fair trial. Thoughtful men early saw that if it failed, the failure was not that of a truly popular system, but of one vitiated by a partial but absolute denial of the popular principle. If on the other hand, it succeeded, its success would be the sublimest proof of the enduring character of such a government, and a final vindication of a wise faith in man.

The hour of trial came. It came under a cloud of circumstances apparently fatal to the system. It came as disease comes to a poisoned frame. "The bubble has burst!" cried those who had sneered. "God save the People!" prayed those who had believed. And as a ship struggles and breaks against the thunder and shock of mingled tempest and ocean, so with sure persistence, with unqualing courage, with unwavering faith, giving their time, their money, their heart's-blood, the people breasted the combined and prolonged fury of anarchy and despotism, and triumphed. To-day they stand erect and victorious under the perfect rainbow of the departing storm, and that bow is the promise of peace to mankind.

The experiment is complete. The popular principle has been found sufficient to suppress an unprecedented rebellion at home and to avoid foreign interference; and it has done this without losing its essence or its form. A vast volunteer army of citizens—a formidable navy built and manned in the very stress of war—an enormous loan taken by the people—these have been the means, with no arbitrary measures but such as the Constitution itself contemplated and provided—by which this result has been achieved. And that the people remain under no essential element, the labor was accomplished under the leadership of a man whose purity of life and sublime simplicity of genius, added to his profound faith in liberty and entire reliance upon law, made him the characteristic representative of the American people and of republican institutions. In the bright garland of the rejoicing festival a leaf of rue will be woven in tender memory of him, nor will any orator forget to mingle with the fame of LINCOLN with his celebration of the national unity and liberty which the stout heart and the strong arm of the people have maintained.

We have a right to rejoice as never before—for we have now the authority of experience to believe that every question within the nation will be wisely settled by the same popular good sense and patient heroism which has saved the nation.

THE PUBLIC SAFETY.

FIVE years ago, when the Government of the United States was threatened with destruction, a large party declared that it had no constitutional right to defend itself, but must consent to its own overthrow. The Government was in other words, the people acting through their lawful authorities—declined to be destroyed, and after a long and terrible struggle, which took all its forms and experience of war, has succeeded in subduing the armed insurrection against its authority. Having thus, at the cost of a quarter of a million of lives, an enormous public debt, and a universal derangement of affairs, once more established that authority, it is now told that it has no constitutional right to secure it. This assertion is not made by the advocates and apologists of the rebellion only, but in the New York Daily Times we find this extraordinary statement: "We do not suppose, therefore, to Mr. DANA's position, that we may rightfully impose upon the Southern States any requirements which we may deem essential to the public safety." That is to say, the Government of the United States must submit to any measures which "the Southern States" may choose to adopt in the reorganization, even if it considers them to be destructive of the public safety.

Fortunately for the country this is not the ground taken by the President of the United States. Slavery, he says in his last Maine message, is dead, and whatever your State Constitution may say about it, it is still true, said President ANDREW JOHNSON, speaking in the name of the United States, that "there is no power in the people of South Carolina can be admitted into the Senate or the House of Representatives until they afford evidence by their conduct of their loyalty."

The President imposes the condition of emancipation on the State reorganization because the public safety requires it. Upon what other ground has the public safety been the Government waged war? What was the war but the maintenance of the national authority against local opinion, which unanimously declared it unsafe? And in that part of the country which was the seat of war what political authority exists at this moment but that of the nation? If it is asserted that the people of the Southern States, we should like to know in the present situation who is to decide that point? If it be assumed that certain loyal citizens represent the States, we should like to know who settles that question? Clearly the people of the United States through their lawful Government; and while undoubtedly those citizens who have given governments may be organized as speedily as the public safety will permit, they are resolved will equal unanimity that no State government shall be established any where in the country except upon conditions which they may deem essential to the public safety.

If the political authority of the United States be not at this moment absolute over every square inch of South Carolina, then some other authority is paramount there. What is it? If it is the State authority? If that be the case, then the State Constitution regulates it, and regulates it independently of all other. But if there be another authority which refuses to recognize any validity in the State Constitution except upon prescribed conditions, then that authority is paramount, and it may exercise a reformation in parts or altogether of that Constitution. If the Times be correct, the proclamations of President JOHNSON are unconstitutional, because he has imposed upon the Southern States requirements which he deems essential to the public safety—a course which seems to us to be both that of the Constitution and of common sense.

Suppose that a certain number of persons living in the State of South Carolina should call a convention, reaffirm the Constitution, take an oath of fidelity to the Union, and claim to be reorganized as the State of South Carolina. The whole country would laugh at them for their pains. Before the total ruin of the rebellion this was the kind of advice given to the rebels by the New York World. "Summon your Legislatures," it said, "repeal the act of secession, lay down your arms, and LINCOLN can do nothing. Elect your Senators and Representatives, send them to Washington; and as the House is not organized they will have a voice in the organization." If the Times be correct, this was sound advice. If the country can not impose upon the reorganization of rebel States such conditions as the public safety may require, then the public safety is at the mercy of those rebel States.

If, again, it be alleged that although all the people in the State have by the State attitude of rebellion forfeited their political rights, and that they are restored by the pardoning power under certain conditions, the whole argument falls to the ground by its own terms. For, manifestly, if all the people in a State have forfeited their political rights there is nobody which can rightfully exercise political power there, except by the will of the national authority, and under such conditions as it may impose with a view to national peace and security.

That is practically the cardinal point in the labor of reorganization, which is now plainly apparent. The United States having overthrown the armed resistance to its authority is now bound to see that authority wherever it has been denied and assailed upon such conditions as it conceives essential to the public safety. Those conditions must be entirely unknown to any State Constitution in the recovered district. Indeed, in every instance thus far they are unknown to those Constitutions. In Mississipi, for instance, the State Constitution that every free white male of a certain age shall be deemed a qualified elector. But the President sets aside the fourteen years of such electors, and admits to vote only those of the remainder who shall take an oath unknown to the letter and abhorrent to the spirit of the State Constitution. It is the assertion in other words of the friends and apologists of the rebellion only, but in the New York Daily Times we find this extraordinary statement: "We do not suppose, therefore, to Mr. DANA's position, that we may rightfully impose upon the Southern States any requirements which we may deem essential to the public safety." That is to say, the Government of the United States must submit to any measures which "the Southern States" may choose to adopt in the reorganization, even if it considers them to be destructive of the public safety.

Fortunately for the country this is not the ground taken by the President of the United States. Slavery, he says in his last Maine message, is dead, and whatever your State Constitution may say about it, it is still true, said President ANDREW JOHNSON, speaking in the name of the United States, that "there is no power in the people of South Carolina can be admitted into the Senate or the House of Representatives until they afford evidence by their conduct of their loyalty."

The President imposes the condition of emancipation on the State reorganization because the public safety requires it. Upon what other ground has the public safety been the Government waged war? What was the war but the maintenance of the national authority against local opinion, which unanimously declared it unsafe? And in that part of the country which was the seat of war what political authority exists at this moment but that of the nation? If it is asserted that the people of the Southern States, we should like to know in the present situation who is to decide that point? If it be assumed that certain loyal citizens represent the States, we should like to know who settles that question? Clearly the people of the United States through their lawful Government; and while undoubtedly those citizens who have given governments may be organized as speedily as the public safety will permit, they are resolved will equal unanimity that no State government shall be established any where in the country except upon conditions which they may deem essential to the public safety.

If the political authority of the United States be not at this moment absolute over every square inch of South Carolina, then some other authority is paramount there. What is it? If it is the State authority? If that be the case, then the State Constitution regulates it, and regulates it independently of all other. But if there be another authority which refuses to recognize any validity in the State Constitution except upon prescribed conditions, then that authority is paramount, and it may exercise a reformation in parts or altogether of that Constitution. If the Times be correct, the proclamations of President JOHNSON are unconstitutional, because he has imposed upon the Southern States requirements which he deems essential to the public safety—a course which seems to us to be both that of the Constitution and of common sense.

Suppose that a certain number of persons living in the State of South Carolina should call a convention, reaffirm the Constitution, take an oath of fidelity to the Union, and claim to be reorganized as the State of South Carolina. We are to show that we know how to use victory as well as to win it. We are to show that our faith in the equality of human rights and in a government founded upon the consent of the governed is as sure as our power to defend that government against a treasonable faction. By our true moderation, by our manly firmness, by our just regard for our own rights and honest respect for those of others, by our independence of precedents established by aristocratic authority, and by our perfect confidence in our ability to make ruler of policy as well as to frame them, we are to show that in no point of a secure and economical and free government is a republic inferior to the most cunningly balanced aristocracy or paternal monarchy.

The faith of our true friends in Europe has been substantially our own, and the Thanksgiving is common to us all.

A SIGNIFICANT ORDER.

GENERAL TERRY, the hero of Fort Fisher, now commanding in Virginia, has issued a most important order. The laws of Virginia which applied to free colored persons were, as he says, substantially part of the slave code. Yet to those laws all the population freed by the emancipation proclamation were subjected. General TERRY, therefore, says that the law expires with the reason of the law, and that henceforth all people of color will enjoy exactly the same personal liberty as all other citizens, and will be subject to the same restraints and punishments, and no other. Neither whites nor blacks will be permitted to be vagrants, but both whites and blacks must be employed somewhere they will. And as during the suspension of the civil tribunals criminal justice must be administered by military courts, the evidence of colored persons will be received by such courts in all cases.

This is simple common sense. The United States Government acknowledges no distinction between white and colored citizens, and wherever its authority is paramount no such distinction can be permitted. If every provisional Governor of the late rebel States were like Major-General TERRY, the country would be spared infinite trouble.

CHARACTERISTIC ADVICE.

THE London rebel organ, the Index, advises English and French capital to invest itself as rapidly as possible in the Southern States, that as climate may be established between them and Europe, by which an interest adverse to "the Northern oppressor" may be fostered. But for nothing, according to the Index, is this direct trade so desirable as in literature. Indeed that excellent authority informs us that "no true Southern gentleman or lady will ever for amusement's sake read a Northern book or periodical, Northern written or Northern printed.....The Southern book trade alone was worth to the North before the war many millions of dollars. It need not be as many thousands. And above all other books the most immediate and imperative want of the South is for school-books."

Here is the same delightful disregard of all the laws of human intercourse which do not depend in the least degree upon whim or passion that we have been from the first taught the late rebels. It springs from the same amusing ignorance which used to threaten New York with ruin if Virginia, Kentucky, and which proposed that an indignant resolution of a convention of slaveholders could make Charleston a great commercial capital. The worthy souls might have as well resolved that there should be coral reefs and beds in South Carolina, and exhaustless iron mines in Florida.

Production and trade are very independent of the proceedings of hot-headed conventions. Fugitive-slave-bill MASON once defiantly came to the Senate of the United States in a suit of Virginia homespun. That was the day in which the "true Southern gentleman" was to ruin all the woolen mills in the wicked "North." Somehow the quiet people of the North went on busily and showed the Connecticut trade mark. It is a final law. The trade mark of cheapest production will always be turned up on every counter in all the world. Manufacture is the hottest Egyptian pachs, resolved to make Egypt independent of the world. The valley of the Nile had long produced indigo of the finest quality. So the pachs planted indigo in the grain fields. He raised a good crop. He even controlled the European indigo market. But, meanwhile, Egypt wanted food, and indigo presently yielded to the grain.

The inevitable law includes literature no less than wheat and indigo. Sachs Southern which edits the Index demanded a "Southern" literature, to be supplied by "Southern" genius, and to be supported by "true Southern gentlemen and ladies." It was like saying that true wine should be drunk in the South except that which was raised from Southern vines, upon Southern soil, and iced from the Gulf of Mexico. As a matter of experience MR. WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS did create a literature in many volumes. But they were printed in New York. Where they were sold or read we have never learned. Now, however, it appears that there is a suspicion of the power of a region to produce a literature merely because it does not feel friendly toward another region, and it is suggested that England shall supply books to the South. And if, says the Index, "publishers would only..... adapt editions a little more nearly to the American standard of prices they would have little to apprehend, at least so far as the Southern country is concerned, from the absence of an international copyright treaty with the United States." The suggestion is simple. If England will only furnish more desirable books at a cheaper rate than the Yankees she can drive them out of market. Who doubts it? If not, the hapless "true Southern gentleman or lady" will be obliged to read "Northern" books and pay extravagant prices.

This is the wisdom of the organ of the late rebellion in London. "The true Southern gentleman and lady" will hereafter read the books which they can buy cheapest. But if such books are "Northern printed" they will not amuse! We congratulate London upon so luminous an Index.

NO MORE FOREIGN GOODS.

It is well understood that the tariff will be remodeled at the next session of Congress. Three distinct parties demand alterations in the present schedule of duties. One party, calling themselves Free-traders, ask that the duties on foreign goods be reduced, and that Government may more exclusively on the products of internal taxes for revenue. Another party, calling themselves Protectionists, demand that the duties be raised on all foreign commodities which enter into competition with home manufactures. And a third party request that the duties on foreign goods be raised, with a view of checking importations and diminishing the outward flow of specie.

The Free-traders stand on principle. They denounce all interference by Government with the freedom of trade; and assert, with good reason, that protective duties are merely taxes on one class of the community for the benefit of another class. The Protectionists, on the other hand, argue from the point of view of self-interest, and claim that it is the interest of the country that manufactures be developed, and that this can not be completely achieved until, for a period, they have been relieved altogether from foreign competition. This argument, sound or unsound as it may be, is likely to be urged in quarters where it might have been supposed that free-trade doctrines would have been generally prevalent. Illinois is not blind to the prospect of becoming the great manufacturing State of the Union.

But it is possible that the views of both these classes may be made to give way to the more immediate cogency of the reasoning of the third party to which we have alluded.

It can not be denied that there is danger of large importations, and consequently of a heavy drain of gold, and consequently of a high premium upon specie. It is now certain that the Western crop promises to be the largest ever harvested. It follows that the Western people are going to be rich, and will, of course, have a great deal of money to spend. That, in the ordinary course of events, they will spend a large portion of this in foreign drygoods and foreign luxuries, is clear. Our merchants are making their importations already for a heavy fall trade, and from present appearances, if no currency disturbance occurs, the spring trade will be even heavier. Now, it is obvious that the country needs a good heavy importation without very serious injury. The slight circumstance of a few millions of gold being exported in Europe can has enabled speculators to "corner" the gold market, and the premium has risen from 129 to 142. For daily delivery gold is worth from 2 to 3 per cent. a day. If in October or in February next, we have to pay for an unusually large quantity of foreign goods, and cotton does not come forward in very large amounts to discharge the debt, gold will be shipped in quantities which may render it as much more valuable than greenbacks as it ever was.

It is this danger which has led many men to consider the expediency of raising the tariff upon all foreign goods which are not of primo necessity to the country that would prove prohibitory. Tea, coffee, hides, spices, drugs, and some other similar articles we can not dispense with, and to tax them these should never be so high as to diminish materially their consumption, otherwise it becomes unduly oppressive on our own people. But foreign silks, woolens, cottons, laces, hardware, glass, wines, cigars, tobacco, etc. etc., constitute more than one half the entire import list, and we could dispense with the whole of them. Most of these articles can be made at home, and the others are superfluities. Suppose Congress levied a duty of 200 or 250 per cent. on these articles, and thus shut them out altogether?

The effect would be that our wives would not be able to indulge in the luxury of Lyons silks, or their husbands in Champagne, Chateau Yquem, and fifty cent Cabañas: which would be sad. But, on the other hand, another effect would be that the country at large would have $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 less to pay to the world at large, and would not require to export specie: whence it would follow that coin would accumulate at the central points, and that the first tight money-market would very materially reduce the premium on gold. Whether this would be an advantage that would compensate us for the privation of silks and Champagne every reader must decide for himself.

In this country, as a rule, price—within certain limits—does not govern expenditure. The consumption of foreign goods has never been regulated by tariffs: it has often been larger under a high tariff than under a low one. But it has always been in direct ratio to bank expansion. Given the bank discounts of the United States, it has always been easy to figure out the importations of foreign goods and the consumption, or, in other words, the extravagance of the people. To put the formula in homelier language, we always spend all the money we can get, whether it procures us little or much.

But the expenditure of an absolutely prohibitory tariff has never been tried. The tariff of 1828–30, against which South Carolina rebelled, and which was repealed as intolerable, was less severe than the tariff now in force. No tariff has ever been adopted in this country with the direct purpose of excluding foreign goods. We know that American women will wear nearly as many silk dresses at $4 a yard as they would at $2, and that they will probably think them not as much Champagne at $5 a bottle as at $2 50. But if the silks cost $15 a yard, and the Champagne $15 a bottle, would the importers find customers?

Of course no prohibitory tariff would be permanent. The tendency of the country is naturally to gravitate toward free trade. We are now in a transition state. We may be said to have no financial policy, and no capacity to adopt one until a return to specie payments has been effected. This will soon be attempted, by make-shift, and empirical effort to stay the bad effects of a violation of financial laws. The question of specie payments is not one, in the first abstract to exclude foreign commodities, or to impose prohibitory duties on articles which our people want; but whether, in view of our peculiar circumstances, it is not important of getting back to specie payments as soon as we can, some sacrifice had better not be made. And some sacrifice would be made by the acceptance of our people, in the hope of checking the outflow of specie, and the inevitable tendency of gold to rise as it becomes scarce.

NO DANGER!

A CRITIC of the Boston meeting to consider the true policy of reorganization, says that there is nothing to warrant the assumption that if "the loyal residents of the different States of the South can control the exercise of their vote, the residents of other States enjoy without dispute, they will do so to the prejudice of a particular interest."

The critic has apparently failed to observe that the object of the Boston meeting was to recommend that "the loyal residents," and not a part of them, should control the vote, which should exercise the political power of the State. The critic means, however, not the loyal residents, but a certain class of them, and he asserts that there is no reason to believe that they will endanger the rights of any particular interest—that is, disfranchise the colored loyal citizens of the States. This is rather a bold statement in view of the facts.

Tennessee, for instance, has reorganized, and has only disfranchised the rebels, leaving voters on him with every kind of civil disability. The Nashville Times says of the bill ordaining the status of the colored population: "We opposed the bill while pending in the Legislature, and do only because it was essentially wrong in some features and wholly uncalled for in others, but on the occasion of the passage of the bill the opinion of our Congressional delegation in the next Congress.....So far as it adds any thing to our present laws it is a bill to re-establish slavery."

In North Carolina the correspondent of the Times says that "opposition to negro suffrage at present is unanimous." Among whom? Among those loyal men by which it is proposed to intrust exclusively the reorganization of the State, and of which the same correspondent says: "I am glad to say that the great mass of the intelligent portion of the community will have some slight leaning in opposition to the authority of the National Government. Many who had been considered strong Union men when I found had not better claims to that honorable appellation than hearty and unqualified disapproval of the proclamation of emancipation, and of DAVIS and his minions." So also MR. ASHLEY, Assistant Superintendent of Negro Affairs, says, two weeks later, "The spirit of slavery in all its sense still lives in North Carolina, and is determined to dominate."

In Virginia, Provost-Marshal-General WELLS says of the late election there that he had learned "an oath of allegiance was not conclusive evidence of loyalty; but that it was surely worthless unless accompanied by consistent conduct and loyal acts." In Dinwiddie and Roanoke Counties, Virginia, the people, who, the conciliatory Tribune says, are deterred from imitating their late example, BERRY, the negro, has learned to blow out, have resolved to pay five dollars at monthly wages to colored men, whose movements they narrowly restrict; and the people of these counties have probably exactly as much brains and of the same kind as the rest of the population in the late rebel States.

The New York Times, also, in an elaborate and careful article, declares that "the loyal men of the South will not give it" [the suffrage] —meaning, of course, by "loyal men," white men; and adds, in proof of its assertion, that the seven new Constitutions of the Border and Southern States expressly limit the suffrage to white men. The Tribune says: "We trust, on the contrary, that the ruling caste at the South may be prompted to do what is just and needful by their own enlightened convictions of justice, security, and policy." It then despairingly asks: "Why should the South insist on the perpetual serfdom or vassalage of her principal body of laborers?" There is such a thing as history. Why did she insist upon it? That is the reason why she will.

The testimony is uniform. The rights of "a particular interest" are necessarily endangered by confiding all the political power to another interest. The character of that interest is described in the letter we have quoted from the Times. And can any body say why the rights of nearly half the population at the South, and the peace of the whole country, should be endangered by the people who have "a slight leaning" toward treason? Would the proprietors of papers which advocate this policy insist upon intrusting their business and property to those who had "a slight leaning" toward arson and burglary? Or would they consider it the perfection of prudence and wisdom to allow such persons to decide whether men of the most undoubted honesty and fidelity should guard their premises and property?

PROVISIONAL GOVERNOR OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

It is just as sensible to speak of MAGRATH or PICKENS for provisional Governor of South Carolina as of W. W. BOYCE. He was one of the fiercest of secessionists and most fiery of firebrands. On the evening before MR. LINCOLN'S election in 1860 he, at that time a member of Congress from South Carolina, was serenaded by the founding committee at Columbia, in that State, and said, "I think the only policy for us is to arm as soon as we receive authentic intelligence of the election of Lincoln.....We will not submit whether the other Southern States act with us or with our enemies." It is scarcely possible that the course of events has taught MR. BOYCE the criminality of such talk. But if there be a body of leaders who deceived and stimulated the South into treason and rebellion, W. W. BOYCE was one of them; and WM. WHITAKER might as properly have been made provisional Governor of Texas as BOYCE of South Carolina.

"CONQUERED BY THE NORTH."

IF his reply to the President, Judge FROST, of the late South Carolina delegation, said: "We are defeated and conquered by the North, who are too strong for us." That little remark showed precisely his state of mind. The fact is, that the people of the United States through their Government have suppressed a tremendous rebellion. But no section has done it. The rebels were the Southern masses and their dependents in some of the States, and the Copperheads in others. The authority of the Government has been maintained against the efforts of VALLANDIGHAM in Ohio, the Chicago Times in Illinois, FERNANDO and BENJAMIN WOOD in New York, WILLIAM B. REED in Philadelphia, and the BOSTON POST as well as against those of Judge FROST and his friends in South Carolina. And when he speaks of that Government as "the North," he shows that he considers himself a citizen of one country, subjugated by the superior power of another.

Judge FROST is mistaken. He has not been defeated by the North. He has been overpowered by the Government of his country, against which he rebelled; and ROBERT SMALT, his fellow-citizen, helped the Government in overpowering him. Judge FROST has, therefore, no right to speak of the people of South Carolina as "us." For half of those people were of the North, and what he calls "the North," and by every means they could command strengthened the Government to which ASHLEY turned a cold shoulder, and which FROST and the rest of FROST'S candidates for Governor did all they could to destroy.

MRS. SEWARD.

THE fidelity of the Secretary of State has been again sorely tried, and again only by Mrs. SEWARD'S unknown what a friend her husband and children have lost. The tenderest of mothers, the truest and wisest of counselors, the most retiring, faithful, as it patient of women, her influence will be forever felt in the tranquil wisdom and fidelity of her heart and's service to humanity and his country.

Her religious faith, her intelligent political confidence, her patient and generous sympathy cheered her long hours of seclusion and illness, and strengthened the heart and hope of those even who seldom saw her face. Refined, also keenly feeling and who owed so much to her womanly instinct, and to that love which has offered the last sacrifice, speak of himself at this moment, it would surely be in the spirit of JOHN STUART MILL'S words: "Were I but capable of interpreting to the world one half the great thoughts and noble feelings which are buried in her grave, I should be the medium of a greater benefit to it than is ever likely to arise from any thing that I can write, unprompted and unassisted by her."—but unrivaled wisdom."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

On the 21st of June President Johnson upointed Lewis E. Parsons Provisional Governor of Alabama.

On the 24th of June the President, at an interview with a delegation from South Carolina, gave a more definite shape to his policy of reconstruction. He intimated that he was probably a better States-rights man than any member of the delegation. He distinctly declared that South Carolina could expect no Government to be recognized which did not, by an ordinance provision, ratify the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. He said, furthermore, that "the policy, now that rebellion is suppressed, is not to restore the State Government through military power, but by the people. While the war has emancipated slaves, it has emancipated a larger number of white men. He would talk plain, as the delegation had said that was what they desired. He could go to men who had owned fifty or a hundred slaves, and who did not care as much for the poor white man as they did for the negro. Those who have the land have the capital to employ help, and therefore some of our Northern friends are deceived when they, living where all think they can exercise a greater control over the freedmen than the Southern men, come here to find out where the interest of slavery has prevailed. Now he did not want the late slaveholders to control the negro votes against white men. Let each State judge of the depository of its own political power. He was for emancipating the white man as well as the black."

DEPOSITARY ORDER.

Major-General Terry has issued the following highly-important order:

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA, RICHMOND, VA., May 31, 1865.

GENERAL ORDERS—No. 11.

The laws of the State of Virginia, and the ordinances of the different municipalities of the State of Virginia, having especial reference to, and made to restrain the personal liberty of, free colored persons, were framed for the government of such persons while living amidst a population of colored slaves; they were enacted in the interests of slave-owners, and were designed for the security of slaveholders, and for the substantially profit of slaveholders.

Slavery has been abolished in Virginia, and therefore upon the principle that when the reason ceases the law itself ceases, these laws and ordinances have become obsolete, and are of color will henceforth. For the same personal liberty that other citizens and inhabitants of Virginia now enjoy, the colored people have a right and to the same punishments, for crimes, that are imposed on others, and to no other.

Vagrancy, however, will not be permitted; neither will those not having visible means of support employ proper occupations, to desert their families, or room in idleness about the streets and public halt neither whites and blacks will be restrained from seeking employment elsewhere, when it can be found at home. It will be unlawful to entertain in their houses, nor from traveling from place to place on proper or legitimate business.

Until the civil tribunals are re-established the administration of criminal justice must, of necessity, be by military courts; before such courts the evidence of colored persons will be received in all cases.

By command of Major-General A. H. TERRY.

ED. W. SMITH, Assistant Adjutant-General.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The English journals and members of Parliament still continue to display strike as much as it would be becoming for us to treat Jefferson Davis and his companion outlaws. The Emperor of the French has addressed a message to the Prince of Wales Lord Brougham and the following reply: "Sire, I am sure you would never wish that Britain it would tell our kinsmen that their best friends, those who stood by them in the darkest hour of their need and through bad report, now pray and beseech them to use the victory with which their courage, good fortune, persevering and no little military skill, they have gained, in mercy and not in wrath. Let them show that they have been faithful with the blood of their prisoners; that they should remember that those prisoners whom they have taken were treated by them as warriors; that treaties were made with them, engagements made with them, and honorably kept from them; and that they ought not to think of rendering their country desolate, and their name, hateful, as well as triumphant, by spilling the blood of those captives they have taken in their power."

Italy and Spain have withdrawn all belligerent rights from the rebels.

On June 19 the Emperor Napoleon returned to Paris, after a visit to Cherbourg. On the 20th a grand dinner and a large number of private houses were illuminated in honor of the occasion. On the 21st the Emperor presided at a Council of Ministers, and at a sitting of the Privy Council. The Empress was also present.

At a banquet given by the Bishmongers' Company in London, to the Prince of Wales on June 21, Lord Derby, the Premier, in responding to a toast of the Navy, spoke of the friendship of the French and hoped the English armor-plated fleet had been made to meet the French armor-plated fleet. Toasts to the Queen were expected to be at the Bishmongers' banquet on the 22d of June. It is Plymouth together. Prince of Wales will probably review the fleets at Plymouth and the Emperor Napoleon at Cherbourg.

THE BELLE OF THE "GOLDEN RULE."

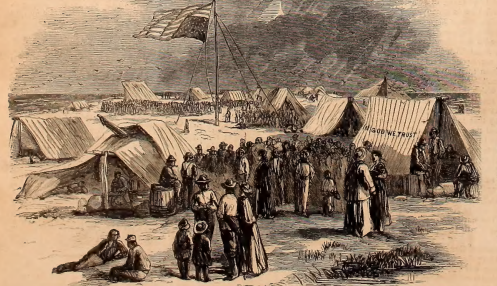
THE WRECK.

WRECK OF THE "GOLDEN RULE."

On the morning of May 30 the Golden Rule, a steamship of the Nicaragua Transit Company, was wrecked on the shoal and coral island El Roncador, in the Caribbean Sea. She was on her way from New York to Aspinwall, and was due at the latter place May 31. The ship struck on a reef, head on, where she remained twenty minutes, when she swung broadside and soon after bilged. Efforts were made to back her off into deep water, but she could not be moved. It was then certain that the vessel must soon become a total wreck, and the all-important problem now was how to save the lives of those on board, numbering nearly six hundred. It was not known at first that the reef which the vessel had struck was part of a coral island, and the prospect offered to the passengers was a very gloomy one, as it was thought that they would have to rely upon boats and rafts for their safety. It was therefore a joyful sight when the low coral bank was discovered near at hand.

The island upon which the passengers were landed was one of the numerous keys or cays which stud the sea of the Antilles, and which are the terror of the mariners who navigate it. They are usually mere banks of sand, elevated a few feet above the water, occasionally supporting a few bushes, or a scrubby, tempest-twisted palm or two, and only frequented by the sea-birds for rest and incubation, and by turtles for laying their eggs. Around them there is always a reef of coral, built up from the bottom of the sea by those wonderful architects, the coral insects. This reef surrounds the cay, at a greater or less distance, like a ring, leaving between it and the island proper a belt of water, of variable depth and of the loveliest blue. The reef, which is sometimes scarcely visible above the sea, effectually breaks the force of the waves. Except a few of the larger ones, none of these cays are inhabited, except by the turtle-fishers. The name, El Roncador, signifies The Snorer. It is a small cay, three quarters of a mile long, and, at the widest, not more than four hundred yards broad—a mere bank of white sand. It is famous for its turtles, which during the night-time crawl upon the shore to deposit their eggs.

The island El Roncador was, after all, a dreary place of refuge. There was scarcely a shrub on its surface. But it was preferable to the hazard of being out at sea in frail rafts and small boats. The passengers were landed in a rain-storm, and were not, therefore, in a very comfortable situation. A good portion of the provisions was saved, though not all in a sound condition. The baggage of the passengers was nearly all lost.



In the mean time there was great anxiety at Aspinwall on account of the non-arrival of the vessel. On the 6th of June a boat containing the purser and second officer of the missing steamer arrived there, reporting the total loss of the Golden Rule. The next day the Huntsville and State of Georgia arrived at Aspinwall, and were sent to the assistance of the shipwrecked crew, which had been now a week upon the desert island. On these vessels the crew was taken to Aspinwall, where every possible kindness was shown to the unfortunate. The appearance of this six hundred people after their temporary isolation from civilized life was far from pre-possessing.

additional companies joined them—one from Boston, another from Worcester, and a third from Stoneham. All along its route through New York and Philadelphia the regiment was received with the loudest acclamations. On the 19th of April it reached Baltimore. Passing through the city in horse-cars, the regiment was attacked by a furious mob. Leaving the cars, the soldiers attempted to march to the Washington dépôt on foot. But the fury of the mob only increased, and in some instances fire-arms were discharged, until at length the regiment was compelled to return the fire, killing and wounding a number of their assailants. In this encounter LADD and WHITNEY, of Lowell, and CHARLES A. TAYLOR, of Boston, were killed, and SUMNER H. NEEDHAM, of Lawrence, was mortally wounded.

These were the first lives lost in the war, no one having been killed in the attack on Fort Sumter the week before. It readily occurred to all that this melancholy event took record there is nothing noticeable in the career of these two heroes thus suddenly glorified by death for their country's sake. Both of them had a stainless moral reputation.

IN 1863 the Massachusetts Legislature appropriated $2000 for the erection of a monument to LADD and WHITNEY, provided LOWELL would raise an equal sum. The monument was erected early in April of this year, in Merrimac Square—hereafter to be known as Monument Square—and arrangements were made for its dedication on the 19th of that month. The ceremony was postponed on account of the death of President LINCOLN.

The monument is of Concord granite. The plan is cruciform, measuring fifteen feet on the longer arms and twelve feet on the shorter. The whole height is twenty-seven feet and six inches. The prominent features of the design consist of a central shaft placed upon a plinth, and also of a high base, upon two sides of which, forming the longer arms, are two sarcophagi, having on each side, respectively, the names of the martyred soldiers, L. C. LADD and A. O. WHITNEY, and inserted in the ends are raised laurel wreaths.

The cornices of the sarcophagi are ornamented with thirteen raised stars. Upon the other two sides of the base, forming the shorter arms, are two plinths, the same height of the sarcophagi, with the inscriptions. On the Merrimac Street side are the words:

"ADDISON O. WHITNEY, born in Waldo, Me., Oct. 30, 1839; LUTHER C. LADD, born in Alexandria, N. H., Dec. 25, 1845; marched from Lowell in the 6th M. V. M., to the defense of the National Capital, and fell mortally wounded in the attack on their regiment while passing through Baltimore, April 19th, 1861. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the City of Lowell dedicate this monument to their memory.

"APRIL 19, 1865."

On the Moody Street side is the following:

"Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise or blame; nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.
"1861."

The horizontal are merged into the vertical lines by fluted trusses, with raised stars resting upon the four arms, and above there is a plinth with a moulded base and ornamented cornice, on two sides of which are bronze medallions of the coat of arms of the State of Massachusetts and of the city of Lowell. Upon this plinth is a shaft terminating with a pyramid, below which there are four stars, one on each side. The composition has a pleasing outline, and is highly creditable to the taste of the committee and the skill of the designers.

The dedicatory ceremonies were simple and ap-

THE LADD AND WHITNEY MONUMENT AT LOWELL.

IF On the 17th of June the city of Lowell, Massachusetts, in common with the highest authorities of the State and the nation, paid public honors to the memory of LUTHER C. LADD and ADDISON O. WHITNEY, the first martyrs of the great rebellion, by the dedication of a splendid monument over their remains.

In response to the President's call of April 15, 1861, for 75,000 three months' troops, the Sixth Massachusetts started from Lowell on the morning of the 16th, under the command of Colonel E. F. JONES. There were eight companies, one half of which were from Lowell, two from Lawrence, and one each from Groton and Acton. At Boston three place on the anniversary of the battle of Lexington, adding fresh interest to that memorial day.

On Monday, May 6, nearly three weeks after the affray, the bodies of WHITNEY and LADD reached Lowell, and their funeral was celebrated in Huntington Hall. A larger funeral cortège than had ever before been seen in Lowell followed the remains from the Hall to the Cemetery.

The manner in which these men were killed naturally awakens an interest in their previous life. WHITNEY was born in Waldo, Maine, October 30, 1839, and was scarcely twenty-two years of age at the time of his death. He had been in Lowell two years, in the employ of the Middlesex Company. LADD was born at Alexandria, New Hampshire, December 22, 1843, and was only seventeen years old when he died. With the exception of this brief propriate. After the arrival of the procession at Monument Square Governor ANDREW delivered an eloquent address, which thus concludes:

"Let this monument stand as long as the Merrimac runs from the mountains to the sea; while this busy stream of human life sweeps on by the banks of the river, bearing to eternity its freight of destiny and hope. It shall speak to your children, not of death, but of immortality. It shall stand here, a mute, expressive witness of the beauty and the dignity of youth and manly prime consecrated in unselfish obedience to duty. It shall testify that gratitude will remember, and praise will wait on the humblest, who, by the lustrous greatness of their souls, or the worth of their offerings, have risen to the sublime peerage of virtue."

RUINS IN THE HEART OF CHARLESTON.

OUR readers doubtless remember the ruinous fire which devastated Charleston in the month of December, 1861. The fire broke out in a basket store at the foot of Hazel Street, and, under the impulse given it by a stiff breeze, did not cease until a considerable portion of the city from East Bay to King Street was destroyed. Among the prominent buildings burned were the South Carolina Institute, the Circular Church, the Catholic Cathedral, St. Andrew's Hall, and the Theatre.

The illustration which we engrave on page 428, taken from a photograph by BARNARD, places before the eye of the reader, and gives him a view of the desolating effects of the conflagration. Standing here, he sees opposite him the Circular Church on Meeting Street. It is surrounded by a scaffold. It was the design of the Charlestonians to repair the injury done to the church. The attempt was made, but subsequently GILLMORE'S shells discouraged the citizens, and the work was given up. At the right of the church are the ruins of the South Carolina Institute, in which the Democratic Convention was held April 23, 1860. In the immediate vicinity of the Circular Church rest the remains of JOHN C. CALHOUN.

There is a tragic interest connected with the scene presented by the artist. The record which the City of Charleston has written for itself is infamous and terrible. It puts forth to a rebellious World unnecessary and inhuman. But the destruction intended by rebels fell with an indiscriminate weight upon itself. Its commerce was destroyed. It was devastated by two conflagrations, the latter of which was kindled by the rebels on leaving the city. For nearly two full years its streets might not be walked without mortal peril. Its haughty citizens, impoverished and humbled, either fled from its precincts or skulked in cellars. And, after four years, the city which had suffered so much for its own folly was relieved from her burden, not by triumphant rebels, but by the final and complete victory of that Government which it had defied, and had hoped to destroy. Surely, a more effective punishment is measured out to traitors than this which they have brought upon themselves?

TRIAL OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

WE give on page 429 an accurate and graphic picture of the Old Penitentiary at Washington, in which the conspirators in the assassination are confined, and where they have been undergoing trial.

There are four rows of cells, which in the picture we give are disclosed to the eye of the reader. Every cell is numbered, and a sentinel guards the one occupied. In the second cell, numbered 2, upon the left, and on the third row from the street, MRS. SURRATT is confined, that cell being the nearest to the turning that leads to the court. PAYNE occupies the cell just below MR. SURRATT'S. ARNOLD'S cell is on the ground-floor; HARDIE'S is in the center. The other conspirators are confined in cells further back. No light can enter these places of confinement but what comes through the windows on the left of the wall.

The counsel for the defense have entered their pleas. Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON'S protest against the jurisdiction of the court is a very able and elaborate document. MR. JOHNSON does not enter into any special argument for the second, leaving that to his associates.

MR. F. CURTIS, counsel for HAROLD, claimed that no evidence had been offered that HAROLD had ever conspired with BOOTH and others in aid of the rebellion. Nor was there any doubt that he had assisted in the escape of BOOTH. He had nothing to do with the murder. BOOTH'S dying words were adduced in proof of HAROLD'S innocence.

MR. COX claimed for ARNOLD and O'LAUGHLIN that, although they may have listened to BOOTH'S suggestions, they were guiltless of any connection with the murder. If they were in any way connected with the conspiracy to capture the President and other prominent officers, they had withdrawn from so soon as more violent measures were entertained.

In regard to SPANGLER MR. EWING claimed that BOOTH'S designs were not known to his client. All SPANGLER was to do was to hold BOOTH'S horse, but he even failed to hold that.

MR. DOUSTER'S argument in behalf of PAYNE and ATZEROTT was sufficiently to the point. He admitted that PAYNE had attempted to murder Secretary SEWARD. He only claimed for him that he acted from his conviction of what was right. In behalf of ATZEROTT he produced a statement drawn up by the prisoner himself. In this statement ATZEROTT confesses that he was one of the party to capture the President, or any member of his Cabinet, or General GRANT, or Vice-President JOHNSON. That he failed; and the second, which contemplated murder, ATZEROTT had broken away from from its first disclosure.

MR. EWING, counsel for DR. MUDD, after an examination of the evidence pronounced it to be insufficient to convict his client.

All the arguments for the accused having been read, Associate Judge ADVOCATE BINGHAM said that on Tuesday, June 27, he would be ready with so much of his summing up as touched the question of the jurisdiction of the court, and he hoped by the next day to deliver the conclusion of his argument.

IN LIBBY.

ALONE, alone, how dark and drear
Is life within this prison cell!
My cold, damp couch seems but a bier,
My very voice a funeral knell!
That sadly tolls amid my pains,
In mockery of these iron chains.

I hear the music of the bells
Float out upon the summer's air—
Now like the sea their solemn swells,
Now faintly as the breath of prayer—
Yet lingering still as if to bless
My heart within its loneliness.

The tide comes up from out the bay,
The sails ride to and fro,
I stand and watch them all the day
Out on the stream below;
But bending sail nor rippling sea
Brings one sweet word of joy to me.

For treason taints the soft South air,
And orphans cry aloud for bread;
While Murder stalking every where,
Laughs o'er its crimes unmurmured deed;
Till Hell seems bursting all aflame,
And Freedom hides her face in shame.

Oh, strike again, ye marshaled hosts
Who draw the sword for Liberty!
For now the hated tyrant boasts
"This land shall be my slavery!"
And yonder where the blue cross waves
GOD up the about: "Ye too are slaves!"

Let not the Past be all in vain,
Nor pause so soothe thy widowed sorrow;
Thy heroes sleep upon the plain
And glory waits thee on the morrow;
For God will hold the Freeman's hand,
And guide thee well, thy own proud land!

AFTER THOSE SEVEN-THIRTIES.

A SIMPLE JOB.

WELL, Sir, there is a certain amount of interest attaching to the commonest jobs in our line, as you say. But the description of the one in question is not what it is in Old England: it's younger, you know. There is some smart fellows among us, though; not that I'm one of 'em. I'm modest, I am. But I'll tell you how I done it; that Oxdell job, if you care to hear it. I dare say it'll sound simple enough to you, Sir. It does to me.

Oxdell's banking-house in the village of L——, in this State, was cracked some three months ago, and one thousand four hundred and twenty dollars in Seven-Thirties was carried off. Mr. Oxdell sent to me for a detective, and I went down. Well, Sir, it was a simple enough state of things. A young fellow by the name of Lawrence Haight had left town immediately after the robbery. Inquiries at the boarding-house showed that he left without giving any notice of his intention. He had been idling about the village for some time, and the landlady he boarded with said he had been pretty hard up for funds, but had told her he expected some money from his uncle; and the day he left he told her he had paid her up and left town. I called at the post-office and found that no letter had come for Haight. Some smart person had received a eye to that passes through their hands, you see; and on the express office the same tidings were rendered. Haight was no doubt the robber. I set out to find him.

The ticket agent and the baggage man at the little railroad depôt were positive Haight had not left town that way. Nothing had been seen of him at the depôt.

I went back to the village—half a mile or so off from the railroad it was; railroads don't turn out much for little places—and found a young man in the bar-room had probably thought to hide his trail a little by walking to the next station—about six miles off—and hiring a horse and wagon there. At the hotel where I took dinner I found that a man answering the description exactly had stopped there to repair the day after the robbery, registering his name as Barton Love. As soon as I saw that I knew the fellow must be a fat, for he couldn't have found out a more ungainly name than that to travel on, could he? ha, ha! I've known hate to disguise itself as love often before that, you see; it's a common game enough!

Well, with that clew I just followed my man right down his ground. He wasn't a hotel he stopped at for the next week but had a dozen people in it who had noticed that young man with the queer name. So I followed him down through the States of Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont, back again into Northern New York, and across the St. Lawrence River into Canada, and stopped at Kingston in Canada West. But there I lost sight of him. I visited every hotel in the place, high and low, and got many a tress of his name; but there's not what way he went from there I found it impossible to learn. So after beating about the bush for a few days, I reluctantly gave up the search and returned home, where I had other business to attend to at the time.

About two weeks ago I had a call to Chicago in the course of another job. I was working up, and after attending to that affair it just occurred to me that I would take a look after the Oxdell fellow. I set out then to search all the hotel registers in town, and I wasn't long in finding the name I wanted. The second house I visited—the Tremont—had the name of "Barton Love and lady" on the register. I talked with the clerk about it, and learned that that man had staid in the city over night, and had taken passage on one of the railroads running out of the Great Central depôt. There are three roads that run out of that depôt—the Illinois Central, the Michigan Central, and the Burlington and Quincy. So I was about in the fix of the man at three crossroads, uncertain which of them leads to the place he wants to go to. In such a case as that, Sir, when there seems to be no kind of a choice in the matter, my rule is to always take the least likely route. Because, don't you see, a thief who has fears of being followed would do that very thing to throw his pursuers off the scent. Now of these three railroads, one was the very road I had reason to believe my man had come down upon when he left Canada, and that was the Michigan Central road. So it being least likely that a man would come to Chicago and then go right back on the same road he come on, that was my route. Not much keen judgment to brag on about that, you'll say; and you're right, there wasn't. It was about like flipping up a copper and crying "Tails this way, heads that way."

I stopped at the first station I came to, on the Michigan Central road, and made inquiries for my man and woman. It's much more easier to follow a man and a woman together than either of 'em separate. I was two days going that way from town to town before my man that he would talk with me, not in a way to let 'em know my business, you see; I'm not such a fool as that, though I don't profess to be particular smart neither. I generally took occasion to mention the subject of the Seven-thirty loan, in the first place, thinking I might happen to hit on something that way; did from that leading up to any topic I smelt ahead that had any show of meat in it.

About dark of the second day I came to that little place they call—Well, blow me, Sir, if I ever can remember the name of that place when I want to. It's a God-forsaken little hole a few miles west of Kalamazoo, in the State of Michigan. It was raining like spouts when I got there. It was dark, and the first place I headed for was a little liquor saloon a few rods from the place where the cars stopped—for the railroad runs right by it. Well, I forgot to have mentioned, perhaps, that it was a freight train I came in on, which accounts for the depôt being shut, you know. So, with my overcoat drawn out through the rain and mud for the liquor saloon.

It was half full of loafers, drying themselves at a pot of a stove, and the fire of that dirty whisky Western coal was burning.

"Nasty weather," says I to my nearest neighbor, as I pulled a stool under me by the stove.

"Yas," says he.

"Any hotel around here?" says I, for I hadn't seen any sign of one.

"Thar's one up to th' Square," says my neighbor.

"How far is it?"

"Oh, half a mile or so when it's good goin'. Must be nigh on to a mile to-night, I'd say. Awful muddy. Ain't you right in, Cale Smith left his butes in th' mud this mo'nin. This 'ere rain'll make it wuss 'n 'twas. Whar d'ye com from?"

"I'm down from Chicago," says I. "Why don't this saloon-keeper take lodgers? He's got a big enough building, I should say."

"Yas, he has, too. But he hain't got no furnitur' yit. He's a goin' ter bev."

"New hand?" says I. I'm a telling you this conversation, Sir, just as it come to me how I had along when I commenced; since you asked it, you know; there don't seem to be much sense in a talk of this kind though, Sir, you'll say.

"Yas," says my neighbor, "he's jest bought. Love was agoin' ter fix up an' put in beds, but he got sick on it, an' sold out to this man—what's name's Harris. I don't know much about him. You're a stranger then?"

"Yes, Mother," says I. "Love sold out, did he? What's he gone at?"

"Who, Love? Oh, I don't know. He didn't b'long here. He's left agin."

"Ah!" says I, thinking there never was such a dodger as this fellow any how. Every time I got my finger on him he 'wasn't thar,' as the man said of the flea, you know.

"Love had a young wife," the man went on, "kind o' a sickly critter, consumptive, I guess, you know—loud colors, green and red and yaller. I expect she didn't fancy the saloon business. I guess they didn't agree very clear out to sudden. Ever been in these parts afore?"

"No, I never have," said I.

"Ah!"

"Wal, I don't mind I'll do."

"Why, Harris," says he, as I came up to the bar, "is this you?" and I stretched out my hand cordially.

"Wal now," says Harris, shaking my hand slowly up and down, "I know your face just as well's my brother, but I can't call ye to name."

"Hain't forgot me, then, have ye?" says I.

"Oh—certainly—you used to be up to Kalamazoo."

"Of course. Thought you'd recollect me. Well, friend, what's yours?"

I never saw this Harris before in my life, Sir, but men in the saloon don't stickle much about accepting an old acquaintance; 'tain't to be supposed a toddy-mixer will have time to remember the boy customers he's in, you know; so I was all right with Harris in no time.

"Been buying something new, eh?" says I, by way of opening a conversation. "Good thing?"

"Yas, I made a good think on't," says he.

"How's that?"

"Wa'al, tell ye! I bought this place of old Meggs two weeks ago for $100, and the very next day after I bought it Barton Love came a-ridin' along, and sez' the old bill 'For Sale' still up, for I'd forgot to take it down, he come in to buy it, an' I sez' here I sold it to him right off the handle, and he paid me $650 on the nail, all in Seven-Thirties."

"That's good money."

"Yes. He had plenty of 'em, too. But he got tired of it right along, and I bought the place back for him for $900. Made $250 clear. That'll do, eh? Ha, ha! Have a drink, Jo?"

When he spoke about those Seven-Thirties I felt a little more of my man than ever before—for it was still further evidence that he was really the thief.

Well, Harris didn't know where Love had gone to, further than that he took the road for Chemuck, which was about forty miles back in the country, on the shore of Lake Michigan; and there were half-a-dozen villages along the route. So the next morning I hired a horse and buggy to go to Chemuck and back, and started off. I stopped in all those villages along the way, and got no sight of him. I reached Chemuck on a Saturday, and as I was a mighty pleasant little place on the lake shore, I took a notion to stay over Sunday, and go to church.

I saw my man at that church, Sir, with his wife, a looking so modest as a Quaker. Though the woman had every appearance of being a bad character, and I thought she looked very much out of place there. Of course I wouldn't arrest him on Sunday, and there was no use now, for he was safe enough.

I had no trouble in taking him the next day. The woman carried on at high, but I told her it was no use. I took him in my buggy and started on my way home. It's only insisted on going too, but I told her she couldn't go in my buggy; if she wanted to follow me in another buggy she could do that, but I'd have to have a constable to drive it for her, for fear of accidents. She agreed, and I believed we all the way back to that village that I can't remember the name of, and took the same train with us—that is me and my man.

She was ten years older than he was, I should say, and she was deeply devoted to him. She waited on him like a servant, and was continually doing something for him—buying him oranges and things, clipping her handkerchief under his darkies to ease his wrists, and so on.

The young man denied the bank robbery up and down, and told a very neat story, Sir it was. He said his real name was Love, and that he took the name of Haight as a disguise while he was hiding from his father in-law——. He had run away from his father, who lived in New York City, out of love for the woman that was with him. He said she was a married woman, but was suing for a divorce at the time he was boarding in L——, and he was waiting for the suit to be tried. She lived with her parents on a farm half-way between——and the next station, and he used to go to see her evenings—spent the day at the tavern in the village. After she got the divorce she came into her money, and that was where he got his money to pay his board and his traveling expenses. His wife were respectable old people, and he and his lady-love arranged between 'em to save scandal by his going off alone and meeting her about the time or two, and at the end of that time they met in Toronto and were married. Then they came on West, and finally had settled down at Chemuck, and they wanted was a home by themselves, they cared not how humble, where they could live and love in peace, away from all their old acquaintances.

A very nice yarn, wasn't it?

Very well got up it was, Sir, and that's a fact—very well got up. But the best of it was, that it was all true from beginning to end, as I found when I got to L—— with my prisoner last Wednesday night.

The real burglar had been caught that very day, and had confessed to the crime. The only thing I had to do was to take off young Love's hand-cuffs and ask him what he wanted of me in the way of satisfaction. He said all his wife were dead, and the new turn of affairs; and as it was night when we got in, all they asked of me was liberty to leave town by the midnight train west, and a promise that I would not tell the L—— people who they really were. The woman had acquaintances in L——. So that was the end of my Seven-Thirties job, Simple, eh? That was just what ailed it. If the thing hadn't been so perfectly plain and simple every way, it wouldn't have let me so far astray, you see.

LOUIS DELMAR'S WOE.

I.

AT Louis' Delmar, who came to America first in the year 1855.

This is ten years ago.

I have traveled much in the world before coming to this country. In France, Spain, Italy. I have talent. Yes! with its Constantinople. I have seen African cities—Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, others—and have fought Arabs in the jungles. It was in Africa I lost my left arm.

After that—shall I confess it?—I lost also my taste for civilization. I wished to taste the refinements of life in civilized lands in the future. I was, however, in this condition—penniless.

I was then in affluence. In 1855. However, my father was too fond of his own opinion—you comprehend?—he lost all. Soon after he died.

I traveled in many countries before I have spoken in the condition of a wandering beggar. Always afoot. But that I preferred. It is the only true manner in which to travel.

I had a companion, as poor as I, and as much a gentleman. We had strange vicissitudes. There were ups and downs for us. Sometimes an abundance of money, sometimes empty pockets. But we labored to earn it, either because or the reverse also.

When in Turkey Alphonse served a whole three months in the capacity of secretary to an officer of the Sultan he shared all with me. But when in Africa I lost my arm in the jungle—ah, Alphons was very kind!—but we were no longer brothers. The taste for the wild life of adventure in the interior was now whetted. Mine was quenched. We parted.

I returned to France. Still I entertained a fond desire to see that great nation, the United States of America. I came to this country but as a traveler then. But I have since remained. America has become my home, which I shall not again leave till I die. Here I have been happy. Here, too, I have suffered, as you will learn.

It was my extreme good fortune to form the acquaintance of Henry Clare on board the steamer in which I came to this country. One day he observed me, a stranger, and addressed me:

"How does it happen, Sir," said he, "that you are a steerage passenger?"

"I choose it," said I.

"I mean no offense," was his reply; "but I perceive you are a gentleman. As for me, I am a Yankee, and Yankees are proverbially inquisitive. You seem misplaced."

However, I do not propose to continue an account of our conversation. It is quite enough to know that from it arose my acquaintance with Henry Clare, which was long continued—until his death, in fact.

In that State of Massachusetts where my dear friend resided I became, through his efforts, Professor of Modern Languages in a collegiate school for young ladies.

There my soul became filled with love for Madeline Bates. I was still a young man. I had never loved. I had never beautiful I thought her!

But with me honor is every thing. In my position it was impossible that I should tell Madeline of my love. Even my eyes must not do it. It was difficult, but I was determined. She was always very kind to me, which made it still harder to treat her de sang froid.

When I had now been for two years her teacher one June day she graduated and went home. I was proud of her. She spoke her French, her Spanish, and her Italian purely and with every grace. None deemed it strange that I lowered near her meteorically on the day preceding her departure from me, as I thought forever; that I devoured her now with my eyes. It was, they thought, the husband's just pride and admiration of his talented pupil, whose accomplishments did him honor. Ah me! I could have fallen on my knees before her, imploring her not to take the light of her presence forever out of my life. I was in despair. No one knew it.

She departed. My duties were now distracted to me. I declined a renewal of my engagement. The old roving disposition was upon me.

"What! you!" I said, and have I been in this land so long, and beheld only the little portion of it where I have lived? What a country is this! I will see its 'Great West' and its 'Sunny South.' I will learn more of this wonderful land."

I would learn it to my heart.

"Father," said the lady, turning to the gentleman at her side, "it is M. Delmar."

"Glad to see you, sir," said Mr. Bates, pressing my hand cordially. "You must ride with us."

I hesitated.

"Come," said Madeline.

I obeyed. Mr. Bates insisted that I should occupy his seat, while he himself sat opposite.

Thus I found her whom I loved, no longer in the capacity of a pupil, seated by my side, chatting delightfully as we rolled through the shaded avenues.

They compelled me to become their guest. Mr. Bates was a widower, and a gentleman of much leisure. His estate was situated at a short distance from the city. He was a true Southern gentleman. I became deeply attached to him. He was as kind to me as if I had been his own son. He prevailed on me to discontinue my wanderings, and remain with him, sharing in the delights of his home—his companion and friend in all his recreations. Madeline, too, was seldom out of my society.

To gratify them both I related my many adventures in foreign lands. It is quite true (I may say it frankly, since I confess myself now changed) that I had been very brave, even rash, in those past days of adventure. Even now, as I told these stories, my blood would bound, and the wild joy of courseness would glow in my breast. I related my adventures with peculiar relish. Madeline listened. Her deep blue eyes glowed with feeling as I spoke of peril braved and danger escaped; her face shone with fond expression.

You are mindful of Desdemona, no doubt. But in justice to Madeline, I must say that I was no swarthy Moor; on the contrary, a young man, but four years her senior, with blonde hair, black eyes, curling hair and mustache, and the manners more of a gentleman and a scholar than of a wild adventurer in barbarous lands. Besides, I had loved Madeline long and devotedly, and only in silence from a sense of honor. It was now different. I had reaped her with my eyes; afterward with my voice. It was one soft July night when Mr. Bates placed his daughter's hand in mine and we were betrothed.

We were soon after married. The father accompanied us on our wedding tour. Our home became the old plantation; and there, a year after, Mr. Bates died. He had lived only long enough to take our infant daughter Clara once in his arms.

After our father's death his affairs were found to be in hopeless confusion. I saved from the wreck a small remnant only of the estate. With this we bought a little cottage close to the city, amid a wilderness of green leaves, and here established our home.

We were happy. My home was my little heaven. My wife was inexpressibly dear to me. Little Clara became a dozen-haired angel, who was our delight to her. When she was three years old our little Louis was born. Welcome, black-eyed boy! Our circle was now complete.

I opened a small store in the city. Here I passed a portion of each day. I had much leisure, which I employed in reading—chiefly the American poets and romancers. To amuse my wife I sometimes wrote a little poem or tale. I acquired a good command of the language of my adopted country. You may perceive that I am not incorrect in its use, beyond an occasional lapse into the modes of expression peculiar to my French birth and rearing. My business rewards were sufficient to insure the presence of comfort in my home, and that was all. I had no ambition. Outside of my home there was nothing in the world for me. I thanked God for the rest and peace that had fallen on my life. I lived for my Madeline and for my children.

To my neighbor St. John and my neighbor Howard it seemed almost incredible that this quiet, scholarly, domestic Mr. Delmar, who came and went to and from his store, morning and evening, so regularly, so much in a commonplace manner, should have been the hero of thrilling adventures in African jungles, should have had his arm torn from the shoulder by a ramped lion, should have traveled over many countries jovially independent of danger or discomfort! Yet it was so. Doubtless I half turned out all the adventurous blood in my breast; for now I was the simplest, most quiet of men, and I was happy.

Contentment is happiness. It is true. And I was content.

Time passed on. There was one evening when I sat in the twilight on the door-step with my little cottage home. It differed none from other like evenings in my thing save that which cause me to remember it. It is the last of the few which lingers forever on the lips.

Ah, how beautiful is that picture now in the memory of Louis Delmar!

In imagination I now stand at my own gate a stranger, and look upon the scene. It is a long, graveled path that leads through a riotous luxuriance of bloom and fragrance from the gate to the door of the little house—the latter so much hid in a overt hidden in its garniture of green leaves and white blossoms. The vines stray out of a bank of honeysuckle on the side of the house. They curtain the windows. They embrace the porch in their loving arms, and droop their bright leaves through the lattice-work. They climb to the roof and wander all over it, going down the other slope out of sight luxuriantly. There sits Louis Delmar himself, the stranger, gazing fixedly upon the green. On either knee he holds a darling. This is Clara, with the long flaxen curls and azure eyes. This is little Louis, with the black curls, thick, clustering brown hair and the father's black eye. Madeline Delmar, his wife, sits opposite, and all is white like an angel. Her arms crossed peace, fully upon her lap. The father sings an old French chansonnette to his children, and the mother looks smilingly on. Now she comes to her husband's side and quietly rests her arm about his neck, or smooths the curls of Louis. Then she sits. It breathes balm and peace. Oh, happy, happy scene! I, the stranger leaning over the gate, could almost feel it in my heart to envy Louis Delmar his little heaven.

That was the last time, nevertheless, on which the stranger could have looked upon it. Beloved, observed. That night the beautiful picture was rolled up and put away into oblivion for evermore. Ah, me! Ah, me!

I had looked with sincere horror on this fratricidal contest from the first moment that I had discovered its existence. I was a Frenchman by American, it is true. Also the instinct of patriotism had doubtless been injured or dulled in my breast by the life I had led from such an early age in many lands. Add that my personal love for America was not, perhaps, remarkable. But I looked upon the act of the Southern Americans in assailing the flag for which their ancestors fought and bled, I confess I was astonished, and horrified. Here was no oppression to resist, no tyranny to combat. All was brightness and prosperity in the land. I had no sympathy with the South. I did not endeavor to hide this from my neighbors.

II.

"I'm wanted!"

It was a young man in the rebel uniform, who, before breakfast next day, called at my house with a squad of soldiers in the suit of gray.

"Fall in!"

I looked with some astonishment at him. Could it be that the rebellion needed one-armed men to fight in its battles?

"Fall in!"

Madeline stood at my side, holding my one hand tightly in both her own, and looking with frightened eyes upon the rebel officer.

"Yer reputation's bad, old boy," said he, as if unconscious of Madeline's presence, "so I've got orders t' shoot yer if yer 'bstreperous. That's all I know about it."

He then released my hand, and placing her palm gently on my shoulder, spoke in French.

"Go, my husband! It can not be that they want you to shoot you."

"No doubt," I replied, "it is my sentiments which are obnoxious. To escape imprisonment, Madeline, it will be requisite that I should become a—"

"Yes. If you were also a rebel you would be unmolested."

"I am found to be such, I shall return to you. It is a great temptation!"

Madeline bent upon me a gaze of such mingled distress and devotion that I was thrilled.

"Shall I yield?" I whispered, with indescribable feelings. "Our country—our country, Madeline!"

"Louis!" said my beautiful wife, with a gaze of unutterable love, "if fault que vous m'aimez bien pea, pour vous didier ainsi."

"No, my Madeline." I cried, touched by these words, "I do not distrust you. This is indeed love's holiness. Farewell."

Thus we parted. Surrounded by the guard of soldiers I marched away. The last vision of my wife and little ones yet warm upon my lips.

I found that I had been mistaken. It was true that I was wanted by the rebels, but not to fight, if I would. I was informed that I could be made useful otherwise than in carrying a gun, thus relieving those soldiers who were capable of that service. I was forced to proceed to join the rebel army of Lee.

Who shall paint my grief as I thought of my wife and helpless little ones? What would become of them? I had been taken away without a moment's warning. No time was allowed me in which to attend to my little business affairs. I was going to be an enemy of the Confederate tyranny; I was allowed no freedom, lest I should escape. What Madeline would do; to what indignities she would doubtless be put; how she would suffer, poor mother; the most appalling pictures presented themselves to my mind till I was frantic.

At first I determined that I would return to her at all hazards. I discovered that many of my comrades were animated by a similar purpose. Several attempted to escape. They were shot.

This deterred me. I should be shot also, and how could I die but one grief to my death? That was far more horrible than endurance. Afterward I thought, even if I was enabled to reach them, what could I do for them? They would thus become sharers in still more relentless persecution.

My countrymen (the French) are a theatrical people. You remember this, no doubt. Every impulse of my French nature impelled me to perform the part. Romance and die poetically for honor and for love. I know not how it is, but it seem to have inbreathed something of the Yankee common-sense since my arrival in America. I looked at this matter with a practical eye.

I remained. During the three months which ensued no less than thirty men of my regiment were shot while endeavoring to escape.

In my French character I might have died with grief at this time. My blood ever was it to welcome death. Cui bono? It helps no one.

I struggled to forget. Labor is the antidote of sorrow. My duties were severe, but my thing were preferable to idleness. Fortunately, after the first battle in which my regiment was engaged, it was accidentally discovered that I possessed surgical skill in some degree. I was called to avoid. Hence, I was detailed for daily among the injured and the sufferers.

Need I say that my efforts were given quite as willingly to the wounded prisoners as to our own men? Little enough was the care they received except from me. I could thrill you with horrors I have not described as yet. Let it suffice to say—wounded. What I could do I did. But one drop is little in an ocean. A thousand men like Louis Delmar could do but unspeakably little. Yet I was often prevented. I was forced to act with caution lest my liberty to act at all should be taken away. But I have quivered with indignation and anguish when I have seen such things, for instance, as this: a rebel surgeon slay the bloody jaws of a dying soldier who cried, "God bless you, sir!"

One day I discovered among the wounded prisoners brought in the form of one who wore the uniform of a Massachusetts officer. He was shot in the forehead. The brain oozed from the wound.

He was already dead. It was Henry Clare.

One Fall level, a heartless youth who acted in the capacity of a surgeon, and whom I had long hated for many of his brutalities, spurned the dead body of my friend with his accursed foot. I struck him to my feet in a thrill of passion at the monstrous outrage. He was soon promoted in the grade of house. While there I received a letter from my wife.

I am one who reads in a letter the tone as well as the words. This letter from Madeline contained no ill news. It seemed to struggle to cheer me. But there was a tone in the very same words which chilled me through and through. It was ghastly, horrible. My flesh crept at it. Oh, how I longed to get to her!

No. I must wait. But I wrote, begging her to explain all to me. I never again heard from her.

The days rolled on. I know not how to describe my feelings. Understand them when I tell you that at last I became weary of life, unbearably weary. But no. I endeavored to escape, and was shot in my right hip. Thus I was disabled, but not killed.

Then I received a letter from Madeline Dr. Lovell, "it's a heap better than you deserve."

Conceive from this the nature of the medical attendance I received. Suffice, however, to my own acquaintance with the nature of the wound, and to the vigorous constitution which I possessed, I did not die. But I was for life, notwithstanding.

With the surrender of Lee to the noble General Grant I at last became free, like the rest of my comrades. But I was a cripple for God. But I was now a wreck of the former Louis Delmar.

Behold me on my weary homeward march, heartsick. Such were my gloomy forebodings with regard to my family. I knew not why. In my threadbare suit of rebel gray, with a rusty black sack, covering little; a thin, worn blanket over my shoulder; grasping a stick I had cut from a tree; thus I limped along the red clay road, gazing ever onward, toward home. Toward home.

I, the stranger leaning over the gate of that home, in my joyful twilight, "years, years, years ago" (was it not?), could have envied Louis Delmar. Who would envy Louis Delmar now? As the hour slipped away I drew to the loved spot. As he paused at the old grave-yard on the hill, just beyond the city, and looked down upon the scene. As he sauntered on by the road along the fence-skirted road for the cottage in which he had left his Madeline, Clara, and little Louis.

Where was it?

It should be yonder, opposite the peach orchard. I hastened there, with head bent and trembling heart. My heart stood still, and my face blanched as I looked upon the ruins of my home. The charred and blackened beams lay in a confused mass, over which the old vines wandered lovingly still, but as if lost and saddened. Weeds and rank grass grew around, choking the flowers to death with riotous arrogance.

I sank helpless.

III.

It was twilight now when I raised my head and looked about me with haggard eyes. I noted that the grass was very luxuriant and green. I observed that the peach-trees gave token of but a light yield of fruit this year. Neighbor St. John's corn was growing well. I took notice of things like these for the first time in three years, like one who dreams.

Then I remembered my woe. My face fell forward upon my palms, and I sobbed like a little child.

While thus engaged, careless of all about me, I felt a small hand laid upon my bowed head.

I looked up, and beheld a dozen-haired little girl, slender, hollow-eyed, with sunken cheeks and bony hands, who looked into my face with sad blue eyes, and said,

"Man, don't cry."

"My child! Clara!" I exclaimed, and fell on my knees before her. I clasped her to my breast, I covered her face with my kisses. She knew me. How my heart thrilled as my daughter passed her little white arm about my neck, and gazed upon me with unutterable love!

Ah! I thought I should tell you of all that followed; but I can not, I can not. My heart breaks with its load.

My wife had gone, no one knew whither. She was believed to have become insane. Little Clara had remained at the house of my neighbor Howard. But now starvation was at the door. Mr. Howard had been killed in the war. She regarded —there had been but—had been sold long ago. Mrs. Howard with her two daughters contemplated going North, for what could they do?

And my little Louis? In the old grave-yard on the hill, where the crumbling and mouldy graves were scattered in every direction. My boy's dust is there.

Thus had this sum of crimes done for me. I am but one. There are some who have suffered more than I. This is but my story. Is it nothing? Will my adopted country forget these wild-flowers still-unbidden in responsible even for Louis Delmar's woe?

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A STANDARD and a German held debate over the relative smartness of the different nations of the world. "I was born between two days," said the latter, with a sting but without disturbing but." "Do that," said the German, "and I will tell you you what I was." So they went into the wood Had searched till they had found a tree split down the top of it. The German stopped, took off his sword, and belt, and spurs, his rustling silk sash, and his coat, and thrust them at the foot of the tree, and began noiselessly to mount. While he was mount up gained the top of it. He squeezed with all the Spaniard's arms and cap, and cloak and feathers. It was secured, therefore, that the German was the smarter fellow.

A Methodist and a Quaker having stepped at a public house, the Quaker was asked to pay for them. The Methodist knelt down, prayed fervently, and confessed a long catalogue of sins, but said not a word about paying. Quietly, friend, if thou art so base as thou sayest thou art, I think I dare not sleep with thee."

EXTREME POLITE.—A young widow of very polite address, whose husband had lately died, was visited soon after by the minister of the parish, who, in order to console her, remarked that "he was sorry, when she replied, with a peculiar smile, "He's dead, I thank you."

WHY is a marriage-certificate like an article of public credit and an old widow? Because it is a widow-paper.

A KIND OF ANGLING THAT DOESN'T ALWAYS TAKE.—Fishing for compliments.

"Two men, both cowards, met in a narrow way, neither disposed to turn out of the road. "Give me the road," said one, in braggart voice, "or, if you don't, I'll do for you as sure as I did for the man I killed in a duel yesterday." The other scrambled aside in terror, and when he got to the bottom of the hill began to whistle. Then, kindly, "What did you do, Sir, to the man who refused you the road?" inquired the other, as he got out of your way." "Why," said the other, "I let him keep the road, and got out of his way."

A blind alley could not be called a desirable site for a house.

A contemporary says, "The first printers were THEIR." We never knew that before, but we have seen a good many "light 'uns" within our experience.

We frequently hear of our generals capturing "pieces of artillery." What's the use of capturing pieces?" says Mr. Mantalini; "why not capture whole ones?"

What is cabbage?—A plant popular among tailors with large families.

When may a man be said to swallow cause and effect? When he drinks to the health of his father.

A husband can readily fox the hills of a wife who is not afraid to be sore footing his stockings.

APPRENTICE.—A person who lived in constant fear of the bailiffs. Sometimes, however, one of the apprentices was asked what was the reason of his absence; to which he replied, "Why, Sir, I apprehend he was apprehensive of being surprised."

DEAR SWIFT, when dining at a corporation dinner at Leicester, was rather severe upon a poor, stoop-shouldered alderman. At the close of the dinner he helped to the wing of a duck, and immediately called for mustard. "Mustard, sir!" said the alderman, in perfect innocence of heart, "you eat duck like a goose."

A certain abbot was asked why, in the hearing of canons, he always exclaimed, on any difficulties, though he was so often wrong. "Why," he said, "I am like the boys who in a great snow swallowing without throwing manure into it, in hope that next may fall."

INSURANCE.—The following toast was recently pronounced at a Masonic Fraternal Gathering, and elicited great applause: "The ladies—their eyes kindle the only flame against which there is no insurance."

A gleaner in the window of a patent medicine vender, in the Rue St. Honoré, Paris, reads as follows: "The public are requested not to mistake this shop for that of the quack next door."—Punch.

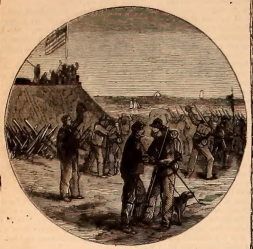
THE SCIENCE OF ATTRACTION—Rimmel's vaporizer.

"THE PECULIAR FAMILY"—The Bonapartes.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

If a bear was to go into a draper's shop, what would he require?

Muslin commanding.



When you stole my first,
I lost my second,
May you ever possess my whole!

Heart-ease.

Why is the tread-mill like a true convert?
Because its turning is the result of conviction.

You eat it, you drink it, they who can't;
It is sometimes a woman, and sometimes a man?
A toast.

Which is the most wonderful animal in a farm-yard?
A pig, because he is killed first and cured afterward.

D VILL TOWARDS MEN.

I SAID TO MY LOVE.

I said to my love—my own true love,
What can I give to thee?
Ermine and purple, or silver and gold
Or jewels the brightest that be?
I will not a jewel, my true love said,
And I sigh not for silver or gold;
What thoughts can they give, or what joys can they bring,
To the bosom when weary and cold?
Give me that which will cling to the heart
When sunshine, and summer, and brightness depart.

I said to my love—my own true love,
What can I give to thee?
A ring that will cling the ages to rest,
When our feet blend the dusted in?
Ay, give me a ring, my true love said,
With a vessel and a musical rhyme,
That will ebb and flow, like the sounding sea,
Through the unnumbered age of time—
A ring that will live and be found in the heart
When sunshine, and summer, and brightness depart.

I said to my love—my own true love,
What can I give to thee?
A song my heart-wind long years ago,
When our feet blend the dusted in?
Ay, give me a song, my true love said,
With a vessel and a musical rhyme,
That will ebb and flow, like the sounding sea,
Through the unnumbered age of time—
A song that will live and be found in the heart
When sunshine, and summer, and brightness depart.

HALF A MILLION OF MONEY.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS,
Author of "BARBARA'S HISTORY," &c.

CHAPTER XX.

THREE AND A HALF PER CENT.

MR. KECKWITCH banished, and the coffee cups pushed aside, William Trefalden uttered a little preliminary cough, and said:

"Now, Sir, to business."

Saxon was all attention.

"In the first place," he began, "you have a large fortune, consisting entirely of ready money, and it is highly important that so weighty a sum should be advantageously placed. Indeed, I should feel it my duty if I suffered your capital to lie idle one day longer than is absolutely unavoidable. It has already lain comparatively idle for more than three weeks, but during the whole of that time I have not ceased to make inquiry in every quarter where inquiry was likely to lead to a good investment."

"I'm sure it's very kind of you," murmured Saxon, vaguely.

"The great difficulty," continued Mr. Trefalden, "is the largeness of the sum. It is easy enough to dispose advantageously of fifty, or a hundred, or even of five hundred thousand pounds; but nobody either wants to borrow, or could give security for such a sum as four millions. Not that I should wish to see your all placed upon a single venture. Far from it. I would not advise even a step, though the British Government were the borrower. But neither do I wish to spread your property over too large a surface. It is a course attended with great inconvenience and great expense. Do you quite follow me?"

"Not in the least," said Saxon, to whom the language of the money market was about as intelligible as a cuneiform inscription.

"Well, you understand that your money ought to be invested?"

"I thought it was invested. It's in Drummond's bank."

"It is temporarily deposited in Drummond's bank; but it brings you a merely nominal interest; if, however, it were well invested, it would bring you an ample annual income, and then you would spend your income, but leave your capital untouched."

"Should I, indeed?" said Saxon, struggling to conceal a yawn. That is very curious."

"Not curious at all, if one but understands the first principles of the law of exchange. Have you no idea of compound interest ja?"

"Oh dear, yes," replied Saxon, briskly, "I know all about that. Greatorex explained it to me. Interest upon interest and a half per cent."

Mr. Trefalden shifted the position of his chair, and turned the lamp in such a manner that the light fell more full on Saxon's face, and left his own in shadow.

"Three and a half per cent!" he repeated. "That was a very limited statement on the part of Mr. Greatorex. Interest may mean any thing, from one per cent up to a hundred, or a hundred thousand. He can not have offered that assertion as an explanation of general facts. Do you remember what conversation that led to it?"

"I not clearly; but he was talking very much as you have just been talking, and he said they would give me three and a half per cent at their bank if I liked to put my money in it."

"Humph! and your reply?"

"I said I was managed every thing of that sort for me, and that I would ask you to see to it."

"Meaning that you would ask me to transfer your money from Drummond's to Greatorex's?"

"If you please."

"I very decidedly do not please; and as long as you continue to attach the slightest value to my opinion, you will not place a penny in their hands."

Saxon looked aghast.

"Oh, but—but I promised," said he.

"Precisely what I expected to hear you say. I felt sure you had been trapped into a promise of some kind."

"I can't break my word," said Saxon, resolutely.

Mr. Trefalden shrugged his shoulders.

"I can't let you ruin yourself," he replied. Greatorex & Greatorex are on the verge of bankruptcy; and I have private information which leads me to believe they must stop payment before the week is out."

The young man stared at him in silence. He neither knew what to say nor what to think.

"And now," said his cousin, "tell me all that took place as nearly as you can remember it. First of all, I suppose, Mr. Lawrence Greatorex kindly volunteered to explain the interest system to you; and having shown you how it was part of the business of a banker, to pay interest on deposits, he proposed to take your money, and allow you three and a half per cent. ?"

Saxon nodded.

"You referred the proposition to me; and Mr. Greatorex was then pleased to find that you relied so much upon my judgment."

"How do you know that?" exclaimed Saxon.

"He has a shrewd suspicion of my high interest, and the troublesome nature of land security; pointed out the advantages of the deposit system; and ended by extracting your promise for—how much?"

"Who can have told you all this?"

"Tell me first whether I am correct?"

"Word for word."

Mr. Trefalden leaned back in his chair and laughed—a little, soft, satisfied laugh, like an audible smile.

"I have a familiar demon, Saxon," said he. "His name is Experience, and he tells me a great many more things than are dreamt of in your philosophy. But you have not yet answered my first question—how much?"

"He said it was a very bad plan to lock up one's money—luck up' was the phrase, I am sure—and that I should find it so convenient to be able to draw out whenever I chose. And then—"

"And then you agreed with him, of course. Go on."

"And then he said he supposed I would not mind going to the extent of five hundred thousand with their house, and—"

"Five hundred thousand! Had he the incredible impudence to ask you for five hundred thousand?"

"Indeed, cousin William, it seemed to me, from the way in which he put it, that Mr. Greatorex had only my interest in view."

"How probable!"

"He said that it could make no difference to them; and that one person's thousands were no more to them, in the way of business, than another's."

"And you believed him?"

"Of course I believed him."

"And promised him the five hundred thousand?"

"Yes."

"Then it is a promise that will have to be broken, young man, that is all. Why, don't look so unhappy. I will take all the burden from your shoulders. A lawyer can do these things easily enough, you know. Besides, no man is bound to fling his money away with his eyes open. If you were to pay in that five hundred thousand pounds to-morrow morning it would all be in the pockets of Sir Samuel's creditors before night. It would help the firm for three days at the most, and you would most likely get your three and a half per cent; but I know that you would never see one farthing of the principal again—and Lawrence Greatorex knows that I know it."

"But—but I have not told you quite all yet," stammered Saxon, who had been getting graver and graver with every word that Mr. Trefalden uttered. "I have given him a check for half."

It was well for Mr. Trefalden that the shade fell on him where he sat, and concealed the storm that swept across his features at this announcement. It came and went like a swift shadow; but the practised master of himself as was, he could no more have controlled the expression of his face at that moment than he could have controlled a thunder-cloud up in the heavens.

"You have given Mr. Greatorex a check for two hundred and fifty thousand pounds?" he said, after a momentary pause.

"I know it was very wrong—I know I ought to have consulted you first," exclaimed Saxon, quite overwhelmed by the magnitude of his error.

"Never mind that at present," replied the lawyer, coldly. "The mischief is done, and we have only to try if any of the money is recoverable. What check did you give it on?"

"Just now—after dinner."

"Ay, ay! After three o'clock?"

"Not an hour ago. We met at the club; he asked me to dine with him—"

"And when he found that you were to see me this evening he got you to sign the check out of hand!" interposed Mr. Trefalden, eagerly. "Clever—very clever; but not quite clever enough, for all that!"

Saying which, the lawyer seized paper and pen, and began writing rapidly. The long scribbled three or four lines, he pushed them across the table, and said:

"Read that, and sign it."

It was an order upon the cashier and clerks of Drummond's bank to refuse payment of all checks signed by Mr. Saxon Trefalden until further notice.

"But suppose," said Saxon, "that one has cashed it already?"

"He can't cash it, you foolish boy, till the bank opens to-morrow morning; and by that time it will be too late. I shall instantly take a cab, and go down with this paper to the private house of the chief cashier; and, to make assurance doubly sure, Keckwitch shall be at the bank to-morrow morning when the doors open. Lucky for you, my dear fellow, that you committed this little folly after three o'clock in the day!"

Saxon signed the paper somewhat reluctantly, and Mr. Trefalden put it into his pocket-book.

"Our business conference must wait," said he, "till this affair is settled. Shall you be at home and alone to-morrow at twelve, if I come up for an hour's talk?"

"I will be at home and alone, of course," replied Saxon; "but I am going down into Surrey by the three o'clock express."

"To Castletowers?"

"Yes—for a week or ten days."

Mr. Trefalden hesitated.

"What I have to say to you must be said quietly and thoroughly," observed he, musingly. "And if you are to be disposed indeed, and want a great deal of explanation—"

"Which is quite certain!" interrupted Saxon, laughing.

"Which I am afraid is quite certain—an hour will not be enough."

"Will you come at eleven?"

Mr. Trefalden took up a manuscript book, and examined one or two consecutive pages before replying.

"I will not come at all," he said, closing it decisively and taking up his hat. "I will run down to you at Castletowers instead, on Thursday morning. The entries in my engagement-book show nothing of great importance for that day, and I think I can manage to contrive it. I believe I can even manage to dine there, and return by the last train at ten."

"That is good!" exclaimed Saxon, heartily; "and a day out of town will invigorate you for a month."

So it was settled; and Mr. Trefalden turned off the last of the gas, and let his cousin out in the dark.

"I will send you a line in the morning just to say that all's well at Drummond's," said the lawyer, as they stood together in the street below; "but you must give me your word of honor to sign no more checks till after Wednesday; and, above all, never to transact any important business without first taking my advice."

"Indeed, cousin William, I never will," replied Saxon, gravely.

And if your disinterested friend comes to you in his wrath to-morrow morning, refer him to me. My nerves are strong, and I can bear any amount of vituperation."

"I suppose he will be very much annoyed," said Saxon.

"Annoyed? He will go raging up and down soaking whom he may devour. But what does that matter? Drummond will not fail upon you, but upon your legal adviser. And I am not afraid that he will eat me. Lawyers are indigestible."

Whereupon they again shook hands and went their separate ways; Trefalden's way being to Bayswater, where dwelt the chief cashier in the bosom of his family, and Saxon's to his stall at the opera.

CHAPTER XXI.

MR. GREATOREX WITH THE FOLISH OFF.

"Mr. GREATOREX wishes to know, Sir, if you can give him a moment's private conversation."

It was not quite a quarter past ten, and Saxon, who had taken a riding lesson before breakfast, was lounging over a book, with the breakfast service still upon the table. He laid the volume hastily down and desired that Mr. Greatorex might be shown in. He was no moral coward; but he felt decidedly uncomfortable when he heard the quick ring of the banker's high-heeled boots on the polished floor of the ante-chamber.

Mr. Greatorex came in, shut the door in Gillingwater's face, flung a crumpled slip of paper on the table, and said, in a voice that quivered with suppressed passion:

"You have robbed me, Mr. Trefalden, to stop the payment of this check. May I inquire with what motive?"

He kept his hat on, and the face beneath it was at a white heat, even to the lips.

"I am really very sorry, Greatorex," said Saxon very nervously; "but I ought never to have given a—a—you. My cousin manages all my affairs, and I had no business to interfere with his arrangements. I owe respects to your office, and—and I am obliged to decline it. But why won't you shake hands with me?"

Mr. Greatorex put his hands behind his back.

"You have insulted me," he said, "and—"

"Not intentionally," interrupted Saxon. "Upon my honor, not intentionally."

The banker heard him with a bitter smile.

"Pshaw!" he said, scornfully. "Why all know what intentions are worth. Yours were certainly not very friendly when you exposed me just now to the ridicule and loss of every petty clerk in Drummond's office. Pray did it not occur to you that the position might be the reverse of agreeable—that it might affect my credit to somewhat unpleasantly among my brother bankers?"

"I feared, indeed, that I might be so unfortunate as to inconvenience you, Mr. Greatorex," replied Saxon, with dignity; "and I told you again that I am sorry for it. But I had no thought of insulting you."

"Inconvenience!" echoed Greatorex, fiercely. "Good God, you have ruined me!"

"Ruined you?"

"Ay, ruined—me—and mine—my father who is an old man of sixty-eight—my sisters, who are both unmarried. Curse you! how do you like that?"

And with this he flung himself into a chair and sat drumming on the table with his clenched hands.

Saxon was inexpressibly shocked.

"You must explain this to me," he faltered. "I do not understand—indeed I do not!"

Greatorex glared up at him vindictively, but made no reply.

"I would not willingly injure my worst enemy, if I had one," continued the young fellow, with tears in his voice if not in his eyes; "much less one whom I have eaten and drunk with and looked upon as my friend. What do you mean when you say that I have ruined you?"

"Simply that we shall be in the Gazette to-morrow. You understand that, I suppose?"

The coarse nature of the man had all come to the surface under the powerful test, and he took no pains to hide it. He was literally drunk with rage. Saxon, however, saw his condition, and, ignorant as he was of human nature, by some fine instinct understood and pitied it.

"But why need the withdrawal of this sum work you so much evil?" he said, gently. "You are surely no worse off without it to-day than you were yesterday."

"This is why—since you will have it! We wanted money—money and time—for we have met with some ugly losses that we didn't choose to tell the world about; and we knew we could pull through if we had the chance."

"Well?"

"Well, there are three or four firms that have heavy claims upon us, and are getting troublesome. Relying on your check for seven hundred last night and desirous them to draw upon us any time after twelve to-day. They will draw —and the bank will stop payment."

Saxon sprang to his feet and seized the check, which was still lying where the banker had flung it.

"No, no," he cried, "not through my act, Greatorex—not if I were forbid! How much do you want to meet these claims to-day?"

"There's one of twenty-two thousand six hundred and forty-five pounds, fifteen shillings, still sullenly, but in an altered tone. "That's the heaviest. Another of eighteen thousand seven hundred and three pounds, one of ten thousand; and one of seven thousand nine hundred and eleven. Fifty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-nine pounds fifteen shillings in all."

Saxon flew to the bell and rang it furiously.

"A Hansom from the stand, Gillingwater," said he, "and desire the hansom to be running them." Then, snatching up his hat, "Greatorex," he added, "I would drive you to Drummond's direct myself, but I could not break my word. I gave William my solemn promise last night to do nothing without consulting him, and I drive you to Chancery Lane first. But you shall have the money before twelve—nay, don't shake your head. It still wants twenty minutes to eleven, and I'll be back in three quarters of an hour!"

"Pooh!" said the banker, impatiently, "I dare say you mean it; but he won't let you do it. I know him."

Saxon's eyes flashed.

"Then you don't know me," said he. "The money is my own, and I swear you shall have it. How many checks may it be?"

"Fifty-eight thousand seven hundred and—"

"Then fifty-nine thousand will do, and that's easier to count out. Come, Mr. Greatorex, jump into my cab with me. I can take you as far as Chancery Lane, and you'll see me back in Lombard Street before twelve o'clock."

In another moment they were flying down Pall Mall, and Greatorex was saying quite pleasantly, and in his usual well-bred tone:

"There's no need, Trefalden, that you should come back all the way to Drummond's. I'll wait for you at Child's, if you like. They know me, and will cash your check directly."

RED JIM.

FIVE-AND-TWENTY years ago it was such a summer, here in Victoria, as it now is in the end of February, 1865; that is to say, the bush grass lay withering amidst moreless dust, and even on the level tree-some plains; the heated air quivered against the low horizon, and dazzled above the withered verdure like the surroundings of a furnace. There had been a long season of drought. Nothing but dry sapless wood stocks, and the weak wandering cattle, were to be seen any where; sometimes the black heavy masses of smoke would roll along the distant sky, and the glaring flames rise in columns. Sometimes in the close night a flush, far and faint, told that the conflagrations which had not yet reached our way were making way over the brush or pasture land. That was a summer I shall never forget! Day after day the same bright dazzling sky; night after night the same hot, weary wandering cattle, were to be seen any where; sometimes the black heavy masses of smoke would roll along the distant sky, and the glaring flames rise in columns. Sometimes in the close night a flush, far and faint, told that the conflagrations which had not yet reached our way were making way over the brush or pasture land. That was a summer I shall never forget! Day after day the same bright dazzling sky; night after night the same hot, weary wandering cattle, were to be seen any where; sometimes the black heavy masses of smoke would roll along the distant sky, and the glaring flames rise in columns. Sometimes in the close night a flush, far and faint, told that the conflagrations which had not yet reached our way were making way over the brush or pasture land. That was a summer I shall never forget! Day after day the same bright dazzling sky; night after night the same hot, weary irritating sense of prostration. I watched the poor half-maddened sheep, weeks upon weeks, with a painful sense of pity which I pressed to me even now. There was little feed they could eat, and still less of filthy stagnant water in the shut-up creeks, and when they depended as their last resource. Listlessly they coiled in the shade, and listlessly I watched them until I began to share their fierce irritable longing for rain that haunted me day and night like a coming maniac. Some nights I threw myself down outside the hut and tried to sleep, but could find no rest; the still, hot atmosphere kept up the fever that was coming upon me, and my slumber was even more feverish. I used to envy the station horse they had left for my use, when I heard him nibbling among the grass in the darkness of the night, and snorting satisfaction that the dew had passed the hazy hills. After a time I began to loathe the weary walk home, and, instead of rest, an extra drop of tea and damper, made a practice of camping where the sheep camped: visiting my hut only as the vagaries of the feed led me to its vicinity; then I replenished my stock, and left with the sheep again. I am sure I had fever, and would even have become delirious, for I had nothing to rouse the frightful monotony—always the same brazen sky, the dead sweltering heat, the motionless forest, the ever-recurring misery of its whiteness, like the faint whisperings of a sea-shell.

One night I was lying tossing about in the long grass of a box-swamp, not a mile from my hut. I chose the place because the ground was cooler than on the unsheltered plain; and as I looked up to the dull starlight I thought of many of my boyish remembrances, and soon felt that I was enjoying what time they surged up dimly and tenderly. How I longed for the bleak sky, the cold bracing wind, and the dusty rain of home! How I longed for the pattering fall of rain on the windows, and the winter comfort of the bright hearth-stone. Somehow these longings were in vain, and I slept soundly, in a partial dream I heard winter sounds again, and loud words, and laughter.

I awoke with a sudden start to see, not twenty yards from me, three men hobbling their horses, and speaking to each other about some bush fire. I could hardly persuade myself that I was not still dreaming.

One of the men was soon engaged in lighting a fire on a bare patch of ground, and I was about rising to join them and taste of companionship once more, when a number of others started up suddenly and displayed a face that caused me to shrink back again with a muttered thanksgiving that I was not discovered. The face that the fire revealed was known to me at once, though I had never seen it before. The one eye and harelip of "Red Jim" had been freely spoken about in every shepherd's hut on the surrounding stations. There was no mistaking the low, bull-dog forehead, the heavy jaw, and the thick neck, were features that in themselves would have sufficiently pointed out the identity of the runaway convict. Recalling the past now, as I saw him then, I think I never beheld so perfect an impersonation of a bad criminal. It was well known that Red Jim had escaped from penal servitude, accompanied by three others, but had arrived in this colony alone. It was equally well known that no one could have survived the horrible journey by cannibalism. Red Jim had ruthlessly murdered one or two settlers against whom he entertained a grudge, and every effort was being at that time made to capture him. There was nothing remarkable in the faces of his companions. They simply showed by word and feature all the evidences of ruffianism usual in men of their class. They had coarse long limbs and heavy reckless faces, marked by the hard drinking and by a long series of crimes. Two of them were armed with guns.

These thoughts and observations passed through my mind in much less time than it takes to write them. I was recalled from speculation by hearing the word "Hallelujah" uttered. The voice was the sobriquet given to my master because of his strictly religious life—the habit of reading prayers in the family morning and evening. Mr. Christmas was a kind, benevolent man, respected by every "hand" on the station; and by none more than by myself. He had been very considerate to me in a late illness, and often sought by many subsequent attentions to show the kindness of my employment. One of Red Jim's companions, in answer to something Red Jim said, replied with an oath:

"Yes, we'll have a psalm-singing will you him now."

Then the other said: "There are a couple of women there, and we shall have time to give them a taste of bush life before morning."

"Look ye," rejoined Red Jim, "we'll make Hallelujah first. That's our look-out. We'll use if the old prayer-patterer has nothing else to do but help to rear a child. Give him a taste of fire before the devil gets him."

I had no fervor, no hesitation, now; the prostration of the last week was left me as by magic, and I sprang at its stead I felt a fierce delightful energy tingling along every nerve. Down close among the dry tindering grass I crept, and commenced to work with a will feeling closing round my heart, I crept from the vicinity of the fire. I pursued my way, on my hands and knees, with a slow determination that has since surprised me, avoiding every branch or twig that might crackle in my path. I hurried on past the hut—but so much as disturbing a sheep.

Not till a long safe distance intervened did I stand erect and fresh for the events of the night. Not once ever they might be, God in his mercy alone knew.

I turned and saw the black forms of the bushrangers move beyond the blaze, and with a run I started for the hut. Before a quarter of an hour passed I saw it dimly against the sky, and almost at the same moment a frightened snort told me that the horse was within a few yards of my course. Uttering a low cry, and giving the animal had found him so providentially near, I substituted the bridle with quick, steady hands, and led him to the threshold.

I put on the patched saddle and bridle, and in another five minutes the line old cob was stretching himself to a long gallop. My mind was too full for thought; but I can remember uttering repeatedly the words "Thank God!"

What a strange night! Still, but, monotonous days, and the enervated frame! What a testimony to the power of mental excitement over bodily lassitude! The horse felt the stimulus too, and sped along without pause or stumble. It was seven miles to the station, and the black belts of timber rose, and passed, and came again, as I hurried on for dear life over crabbed ground and abrupt hillocks. The brave old horse felt the spirit of rest so I had. Once, indeed, he paused at a rocky crossing-place, but immediately resumed the swift pace at which we had started. Had I been capable of presentiment? I don't know; but I have often wondered at the huge, unurged gallop of that brave old gelding.

There, away beyond the black distances, I see something that is not a star. Is it moving, or is it the pace of the horse? It seems extinguished now. No, there it is again. Hurrah, it is a candle! It is the homestead, calm and peaceful. Again, thank God!

Strange to say, I never felt such a sense of pleasure as I did when I learned that I had found the house so quickly—the most familiar point is not easily gained in the trackless bush at night. A minute more and I had dismounted to take down the slip panels of the station fence; another minute and I had galloped up to the front entrance at a pace that dashed the gravel from the trim-kept paths.

The door opened, and a gush of light streamed upon the darkness, glinting on the sides of the reaking horse. Mr. Christmas himself—old, but hale and vigorous as many a younger man—peered out into the night with an expression of surprise. In respond were the evidences of wealth and refinement. A quiet comfort dwelt in the little glimpse I had of the room, that settled upon me even then, rough and unkempt as I was, with a pleasing sense. I can recall myself, bending below the withers of the panting horse, to peer under the rather low verandah, my face red with perspiration from his heavy sides, and my hand pressing the moisture from his shoulder till I heard it fall pattering on the gravel.

Mr. Christmas thought it was the overseer or overseer, for he said, "Is that you, Curran?" and, without waiting for a reply, he turned to place the light upon the table for the return of others I was not by.

"Well, Curran, what is it? I thought you were at the fire."

"It is not Curran, Sir," I replied, "but Ned, the shepherd. I have come to tell you—"

"Better have your supper first, Ned. You've had a hard ride, I'm sure. Is the fire out, lad?"

"There is no time for supper. Red Jim!"

I hurriedly told him all I knew. He heard me to the end without once interrupting, and then said quickly, "Come in. There is indeed no time to lose."

I stepped after him across the pleasant room, where there were seated two ladies reading.

"Lay all these things away carefully as though I held the position of a gentleman rather than that of a servant," this is Ned Graham, the shepherd, to whose unremitting watchfulness and cine and comforts during his illness." The ladies bowed pleasantly as Mr. Christmas continued: "His life now comes to preserve from the villains who—"

They looked at me with some surprise: principally, I think, because of the emphatic, distinct way in which the last few words came from Mr. Christmas. After a pause the master said: "Amelia, Emily—I wish to speak to you both for a moment."

They all left the room, and I, who is curious in such matters, looked at the open books that were lying on the table. One was Ivanhoe; a second Jessie Fraser, the other, I think, opposite the old gentleman's chair a large Family Bible.

In a few minutes I heard Mr. Christmas's step as he returned with the last few scarcely-said words. There was a rigid expression on his face, very different to that which I had ever seen there before: not the slightest evidence of faltering about it.

"Are you cool and a good shot?" were the first words he uttered.

"I am, Sir," I replied, confidently. "Are the guns loaded, and the ladies safe?"

"Yes, to both questions," he said as I can find them, Ned, and the guns are loaded with coarse shot and ball. You had better see if the powder is well up into the nipples. I am glad to see that you are none of the best. A shot missed may be death to us, and to those I value more than myself. However, we are in the hands of God."

"What plan do you purpose, Mr. Christmas?" I asked, earnestly.

He stood in a glass of brandy and I will tell you."

He signed to the sideboard, where a decanter stood. I was about to follow his suggestion, when he said, "Stay! Don't pass between the light and the window" and he placed the table. Every thing must wear the appearance of a true face, and I will tell where they are now, and it would not do to have their suspicions roused.

In a few minutes the light was extinguished, the door was bolted, and we stepped quietly out on the little portico.

"Now," said my master, slowly, "there are only our two selves to defend my home and my children. My servants all absent on a bush fire that was reported this afternoon, and every "hand" We spend upon our coolness and determination. We can not do more than defend the house. The gang will, of course, enter by the slip panels, for they will not run the risk of leaving their horses behind. Then, as the shepherd has heard us talking in the night as this, they will not hazard the pulling down of the fence. We will each take up a position behind the fence posts, take sure aim, and fire low. I'll fire first."

As silently as spectres we walked across to the paddock enclosure, and commenced to crouch at the place indicated. With straining eyes and beating heart I peered into the obscurity. After, I thought I could discern a faint line of light—the reflection of the ruffian's camp-fire. The night was hardly silent and oppressive. There was nothing apparently on which to exercise the senses in the way of kind of overpowering hush. There was a dim haze certain atmosphere, as the night was of a dark darkness. I should have thought that a person that I was dreaming, were it not for the patient motionless figure standing beside me. Inaction under such circumstances is hardly to be borne, and my thoughts often wandered from their very intensity. I began to speculate how long it would take a star to pass some black ragged patch of cloud, and then I would look before me and see it dancing on the distance. Then the fear that I was myself grow upon me, till I saw the hideous features close to where I stood. Still no sound broke on the dark, brooding night. Once, indeed, I heard a horse, with a chilly start, that the bush-rangers might have approached the house by some other way, but up behind me all was quiet.

At last there came a thin faint murmur that I barely caught the ear, and, as I listened to know if it were real, I caught another but better defined noise that overpowered the first. At last I detected something that might be the footfalls of a horse; sometimes it would die away and come on again, but each time more clearly than before. And yet I could not feel certain that I was not deceiving myself. Eventually I heard a muffled sound, distant and defined enough to proclaim the approach of a horse, or horses.

Mr. Christmas heard it also, for I dimly saw him move.

My hands felt along the cool barrels, and toyed with the hammers and triggers anxiously enough, and I put the gun to my shoulder against the sky, but failed to see any "view." Next at I had taken the weapon down again Mr. Christmas said, in a clear, low whisper, "Be sure you aim low, and don't be in a hurry."

At the sounds of the horses' hoofs and of voices mingled I detected the double click from the opposite gun. I followed the example, and, with both guns cocked, we waited the enemy's near approach. Once I recognized the outlines of the men against the sky, clearly as I was; they were approaching in single file, and as they became darker and darker I heard a stifled laugh and an oath. In a short time they were within twenty yards of where we stood, and they pulled up to consult. Although they spoke in whispers I heard much that passed, for my sense of hearing had become extremely acute, as that of all shepherds does. It was impossible to distinguish by the tones who the speakers were, but I heard one of them inquire:

"Are you sure the hands ain't above?"

"Sartain—when Leary spun his yarn about the fire the cove sent 'em all away to it."

"Hallujah fust. If we fire the box it'll bring 'em back."

"And no grabbing the moils," whispered one of them, sufficiently loud for me to hear. I could see Red Jim, "till I make the cursed old psalm-singer a dead log for the bonfire. Then we'll make love if you choose."

"Come on!" said an impatient voice; "don't hold a prayer-meeting over it."

They then tied their horses to a fence that ran at right angles to the post against which I stood, and approached the dwelling in single file. I determined to adhere strictly to the orders I had received, and waited for the opposite fire. I knew that my companion would not fire on the men to advance a little, so that he might not endanger me, and I was with a throbbing heart that I saw the black forms of the ruffians pass between us.

I heard him stumble with an oath over a cart. Then a line of flame cut its abrupt short track into the darkness, and I heard and felt my gun-stock echoes before a shrill cry followed it, as the villain staggered on a few paces and fell, plowing up the dust. The fallen man's companions had just fled out when I heard another snap, as a sportsman shoots when firing right and left. I knew that the master's gun was discharged.

"Come on, Nix! It's the cove himself. I saw him by the light of the shot; his sting's gone now." And one of the men ran back to where my master stood, followed by his comrade.

I had not been covered, but if I fired (I heard the noise of struggling) I might kill my master. Thus I stood with the gun at aim, undecided and half mad. Then I heard one of the men saying, "Damn you, knife him!" received me, and I fired among them. I saw some one sink down, but I could not tell which it was. Then he appeared to let go his hold and rush to the horses, I took a second hurried aim and fired; then I bounded across the entrance, and with a glass of brandy and I will tell you."

He signed to the sideboard, where a decanter stood. I was about to follow his suggestion, when he said, "Stay! Don't pass between the light and the window" and he placed the table. INTERESTING ITEMS.

AN ALGERINE WEDDING.—Morish ladies are usually married at or before the age of thirteen; and I was informed of several instances where the bride of eight years who was present at one of these marriages, the families on both sides being of the highest rank in Algiers. The young lady was very lively, and under this age I have mentioned above. The room in which the ladies dressed by her mother, assuming in all to upward of sixty, among whom were my informant and Mrs. Finlay. These ladies, surrounded the bride, whose head, as usual, was wrapped in a sack, and on her, a few hours before, to be first-born lame, where they were received by the mother and female relations of the bridegroom. The poor child, weeping bitterly, was then undressed, carried by her attendants into a bed, where she was commanded to sleep for an hour or two while they ate their supper! The European ladies were served apart with tea, cakes, and confectionery; while the Moorish ladies (some of them very beautiful) were closely seated on the ground around a large wooden dish, and on their knees a long napkin which extended round the whole party. This napkin served as a sort of low circular table which moved on a pivot, and on which the slaves placed one dish at a time, out of which each lady took a mouthful with her fingers, and with a slight touch made the dish revolve to her next neighbor. The dishes succeeded each other to the number of more than twenty, when the table was carried off; and at eleven a slight refreshment was brought to the bride, after which the ceremony of dressing commenced. Every lady present was requested to take some slight part in this important operation, and my English friend's consisted in plaiting one of an immense number of little tresses into which her long black hair was divided, with a diamond trembling at the end of each! At last she was then consulted, and a pair of gold bracelets on each cheek, as well as on her chin and the tip of her nose, were the finishing touches given to her toilet. Her hair, increasing in size until the lower row reached to her chin, was then tied with wire of the most costly description. She was of cloth-of-silver, with the usual muslin trowsers, and a sort of cross of diamonds on her breast. Early in the morning all was ready and the room prepared. A large wax candle stuck over the door was the groaning down her eyes, which were not to be opened until the following morning, when she was delivered to her husband, and not till then.

At 11 o'clock the ladies introduced the bridegroom, a handsome youth of nineteen, dressed in pale gray silk profusely ornamented with gold lace, and attended by his six place under a canopy, to which the bride was also led by her mother, and placed by his side. He then placed a few drops of rose-water into the bride's hand, which he touched with his own, and the ladies approached also a few drops into his hand, and guided it to the bridegroom's face, who used the drops as the others were pronounced man and wife, and the company immediately separated.

AT HOME.—The highest style of being at home grows out of a genial respect for the affections rather than of the intellect. Who has not met with brilliant men whose faces the unstudied and spontaneous expression of their inner natures, made them welcome wherever they go, and their attract unbounded confidence? And then the wherever they go, and their attract unbounded confidence? And then the whole secret of being at home, because they have nothing to conceal; affable, because they have no affectation; unconventional, because they do not consider overs always at home, because they dread nothing. Such men do not regard their own private circumstances the duty of soul, with fullness of there and every where—for private circumstances the duty of soul, with fullness of there and every where—for private circumstances the duty of soul, with fullness of there and every where—for

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE CELLS IN WHICH THE CONSPIRATORS ARE CONFINED IN THE OLD PENITENTIARY AT WASHINGTON.

THE WELCOME.

FAR, far away the cannon's thunders cease,
Thus far so long resounded near and loud;
And out of War's red ashes rise Peace,
While from the land rule off the battle-cloud.

Toward the far West we, people of the North,
With answering shout and smile of welcome, turn,
While from Missouri's iron hills rings forth
The grand unfaltering chorus, "WE RETURN!"

Up from the fertile fields of Tennessee
Feel the glad tidings to the summer sky;
Northward they toll upon the winds, and we,
With "WELCOME! WELCOME! WELCOME!" make reply.

Come one, come all, come every sister State
Back in the Union! let the old fend cease,
And just of party fade, and bitter hate
Vanish like mists before the dawn of Peace.

Come underneath the old flag; see it wave
Proudly above the nation's pillared dome;
Here in our land dispersion finds its grave—
Hzacefortn it shall be only Freedom's home.

And statesmen in our halls, with wisdom taught,
Shall meet in council where of old were met,
From near and far, the sons of liberal thought
And set the bounds of greatness wider yet—

Till environ lands shall look upon our own
With jealous vision; and to her for aid
The weak shall cling; while on his tottering throne
The Old World despot shall shrink back afraid.

Come then, ye elder States! we fling the cry
Of welcome as to thee our gaze we turn;
While swift the glad tidings to the sky
In one unfaltering chorus, "WE RETURN!"

REBEL PRISONERS AT THE BATTERY, NEW YORK.

THE rebel prisoners are rapidly getting away from us on the way to their homes. Our sketch on page 429 represents a party of these at the Battery receiving strawberries at the well-meaning hands of an old lady. Beyond is a carriage surrounded by a group pressing forward for new shoes, clothes, etc., and to sell fans to visitors.

The Battery Commission has been there distributing blankets. Those the rebels take outside and sell for a trifle, and the same fate often awaits the shoes and clothes given them. They are very dirty, and have to be almost driven into the bay to wash. The question their occupy would be none the worse for considerable cleaning, but these seem prefer to loaf about the yard and flattery in total indolence. People who have been to the barracks offering employment to these men have almost invariably failed to engage any, the few who go to work being of the better class, and they with only to work long enough to procure a decent outfit and some loose change to take home with them. Most of these prisoners are from Fort Delaware and Hart Island. From the latter all the late prisoner inmates, except a few who are too ill to be removed at present, have been removed, and in the former there are now but now remaining. There are now on the Battery awaiting transportation about six hundred of these men, who will probably be forwarded soon. When the barracks are cleared of these, two thousand three hundred additional are to be received from Elmira, who will be afforded transportation as soon as possible.

DO NOT WASTE YOUR MONEY buying any of the numerous worthless articles called GOLD PENS, which have flooded the market for the last few years, when at lower prices you can get pens which are acknowledged to be the finest in the world.

Avoid the shameless Upstarts, whose lack of brains compels them to attempt IMITATION, even to the advertisement. If you want the full value of your money, call on A. MORTON, 25 Maiden Lane, New York, or inclose stamp for circular.

THE COTTAGE PRINTING-PRESS

is the best cheap printing-press ever introduced to public notice. Simple, durable, and efficient, occupying but little space, it is adapted to meet the wants of business men and others, who, for the sake of economy, convenience, wish to do their own printing, and on their own premises. It enables them, without delay, and at a small expense, to print hand-bills, circulars, cards, bill-heads, &c., and is quite equal to that of most country printing-offices. As though designed and will be found useful for all business and professional men, yet to country merchants and druggists it is an invaluable investment, furnishing not only the best but the cheapest method of advertising and increasing one's business. With each press we furnish, if desired, the necessary type, &c., for the execution of any kind of printing.

No more acceptable present can be made to youth than one of these printing-offices. It combines lucrative employment with amusement, and affords a healthful exercise to compose, to spell, and to punctuate. There is no better school for the young than the art of printing-office, such a thing as an illiterate printer being unknown; and for the purpose of teaching them, yet to commence a trade for life, the possession of one of our small printing-offices would be peculiar appropriate and valuable.

Printed instructions for setting type and managing the press accompany each office. Specimens of work to obtain will be arranged for printing in Spanish, French, German, Swedish, other foreign languages, if similar sent free. Specimen sheets of type, cuts, &c., 10 cents.

United States 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES, $230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United States Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths per cent. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. The amount, at the rate at which it is being advertised, will be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, so has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered incurable, or almost incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the intelligent and scientific, or curious which have no parallel at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as heretofore as we ever encountered in any medicine.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: Life is but a few hours' or days' allotted span, is in a state of liquifaction. But when, from any cause, the proper care and life is stale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the system.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURITY OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the victim forms of paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, SALT RHEUM.

This taint (HEREDITARY and ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS, LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, TIC DOLOUREAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most inhuman pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or violent—of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, curing the Bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and restores the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the SKIN, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved its equal.

Both Partisan users of Mercury, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will correct the secretion, and remove the despondency which is always attendant the state.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Biliousness, and the perverted or unnatural condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant sensations, will be benefited by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands universal by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MANS FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S PROTECTION.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

STATES AND STATE RIGHTS.

THE question of State rights is very important compared with the question of national security. The people of the United States have exactly the same right to determine upon what conditions the rebel States shall be reorganized that they had to prevent the secession of those States from the Union. It is simple folly to speak of any part of the country or any body of citizens who are lying under the disabilities consequent upon rebellion having any right whatever to any share in the government of the country except upon the conditions which, in the opinion of the country, guarantee its safety.

In the dispassionate and patriotic, but, as it seems to us, illogical reasoning of many of our friends upon reorganization, they say that the duty of the Government under existing circumstances is, first, to adopt new measures to secure the obedience of all citizens to the national Constitution, and, second, to preserve inviolate the rights guaranteed to the States by the national Constitution. But how if the measures which the country deems essential to the national security should require a violation of such rights? Is the nation to go constitutionally to destruction? Are the national rights of existence, or the State rights of internal regulation, to yield? Or, with the experience of the last four years, are we to assume that there can be no real collision between differing views of the limitations of State rights?

According to the view we are considering the State may have such a Constitution as it chooses, subject only to the condition that it be republican in form. If then, in the absolute sense claimed, a State always exists, this Constitution is the fundamental law, and an election held under it is valid. In that case Mr. CLARK and not Judge SHARKEY is the Governor of the State of Mississippi. By what constitutional authority, then, according to this reasoning, is Judge SHARKEY sent to Mississippi as Governor? Mr. CLARK was elected by the voters under the State Constitution, which, by long sufferance, the United States had allowed to be republican. Mr. CLARK is not impeached; he is not convicted of crime; but he is summarily set aside by the national authority. Grant that he is accused of high treason. Has a warrant been issued? And if he has been lawfully arrested to answer the charge, does not the government of the State devolve upon the Lieutenant-Governor? If that officer be similarly charged and arrested the constitutional provision must be made for the exigency. But all the late voters of the States are held to be incompetent. By what authority? The United States. Then the State has gone into obeyance or paralysis. Who decides that? The people of the State, the voters, the Constitution? No; it is decided in despite of them all by the United States. By what right? Solely that of superior force. On what ground? The national safety.

Now does any sober man seriously contend that the people of the United States, in their government, are constitutionally required to relinquish the exercise of that superior force except upon such conditions as seem to it necessary to secure public safety? If they must require that the State Constitution shall be revised, may they not require that certain regulations shall be inserted in it? If they have authority to interfere in any degree with the local government of a State upon the ground of the public safety, have they not authority to interfere just so far as they think essential to secure the object of the interference? Granting that a State always exists, and that its political powers only go into abeyance by rebellion—an expression evidently invented to conceal a want of precise perception—can those powers come out of abeyance except upon terms satisfactory to the authority that holds them there? If they can, upon what authority do they come? And if there be such an authority, is it not palpably superior to that which holds the powers in abeyance? If it be desperately urged that the Constitution of the United States is the authority, that is merely to say that the Constitution requires that the State political powers which have been in abeyance because they endangered the nation, shall, when the nation is victorious, come out of abeyance, whether they endanger the nation or not—which is sheer nonsense.

In truth, freed from all these misty theories, which Mr. LINCOLN so truly called "pernicious abstractions," one point is perfectly clear. The people of the United States, who have won a victory at countless cost of lives and money over the assumptions of State sovereignty, will not relinquish the fruits of that victory to any claim of State rights. The people of the States which have been in rebellion will not be allowed to exercise political power as States until they make their Constitutions conform to the general conviction of the requirements of the public safety. If the States are in abeyance they will not be in operation until the United States are satisfied that their operation is safe. This is common sense. This is the necessity of the case. This is the true doctrine of the Constitution as the people of the United States have just-interpreted it by war.

THE LAST YEAR OF WAR.

THE fiscal year 1864-'5 has ended, and we are now able to sum up the commercial results of another year of war. Returns from all the ports will not be forthcoming for some time. But of the trade of New York we have pretty accurate statements, and from these the aggregate commerce of the Union may be readily estimated.

New York, during the fiscal year ending 30th June ult., imported goods to the amount of $152,483,652, and exported produce to the amount of $204,103,229, and specie to the amount of $40,113,336. If the value of the exports and imports were returned from the Custom-house in the same currency, this showing would give a balance due the port of about $90,000,000. Generally the value of exports are figured at their value in currency, while the imports are entered at their invoice, or specie, value. This is the explanation that during the fiscal year 1864-'5, the average premium on gold was 100 per cent., which is not very wide of the mark, the true or specie value of our exports would be $102,051,614, instead of $204,103,229, as above stated, and the exchanges of the year would stand thus:

Imports	$152,483,652
Produce and merchandise	102,051,614
Specie	40,113,336
	142,164,944
Balance against the port	$10,318,708

Before the war it was held that one-half the total exports of the United States were shipped from New York, and that nearly one-half the total imports entered here. Since the war, and the closing of the ports of New Orleans, Mobile, Charleston, and other cotton-shipping ports, this proportion has been altered, as the following table will show:

Years.	Total Imports.	At New York.	Total Exports.	From New York.
1861-'2	206,819,823	147,640,342	220,720,221	164,490,745
1862-'3	282,247,055	211,685,291	251,687,692	204,091,984
1863-'4	347,139,063	275,257,317	325,791,370	278,571,402
1864-'5*	328,724,000	152,483,652	378,000,000	244,216,581

* Estimated.

If this estimate be correct, the operations of the year will stand as follows:

Imports, gold value	$328,724,000
Exports, currency value, say $315,000,000
Reduced to gold value, with the basis of gold at 200	157,500,000
New England requires this sum for cotton	60,000,000
	217,500,000
Balance against the country	$111,224,000

Extending the computation to the four years of war, we have the following results:

Imports in four years, gold value	$1,083,804,5
Exports:
Specie, say	$300,000,000
Produce, currency value	1,065,391,10
Reduce to gold value on the basis of gold at 150	723,594,073
	1,023,594,073
Balance against the country	$54,707,668

It must be borne in mind, however, that all such calculations as these are merely approximative. It is easy to understand that a larger quantity of domestic produce was shipped when gold was about par than when it was below that figure; thus, though it may be fair to call 200 the average for the year 1864-'5, the actual amount of gold realized by the shipments of that fiscal year may really have been, and probably were, less than one-half the currency value of those shipments. When gold rose above 250, our merchants shipped every thing they could lay hands upon—even hay to England—and the aggregate weekly clearances from New York sometimes rose over seven million dollars. Such shipments realized much less than fifty cents on the dollar in gold.

The true balance of trade might perhaps be arrived at by a careful study of the rate of exchange, had not that usually reliable test been disturbed in this case by two powerful causes. In the first place, when the war broke out, and for two to three years subsequently, banks and rich men in the border States, and not a few prudent and faint-hearted capitalists at the North, hoarded every dollar of gold that came to hand. This created at times a glut of exports, and caused violent perturbations in exchange without apparent cause. When Lee surrendered, on the other hand, these people recovered confidence in the United States Government, and vast sums of money back again—which created an unexpected disturbance, and again convulsed the market.

In the second place, the European consumption of American securities has called all calculations based exclusively on the published trade tables. When exchange rose to 300 in Wall Street, and all the world was predicted a collapse of the currency, the evil was averted by remittances of 5.20 Bonds to Holland. These remittances supplied the demand for exchange when it was most pressing, and the moment public confidence began to revive broke down the market altogether. Unfortunately, there is no registry as yet of the amount of U. S. Bonds held in Europe. No two bankers agree within fifty or a hundred millions on the subject. It is known that there must be $100,000,000 of 5.20's in Germany and Holland, and there may be $200,000,000. It is also known that nearly all the Illinois Central stock, and one-half the Erie Railway stock, are held in Europe. But what the Europeans paid in gold for all these securities no human being can estimate. And until some estimate closely approximating to the truth shall have been made and admitted, no reliable calculations can be prosecuted with regard to the balance of trade.

There are some points, however, in the trade tables which may be relied on as containing reliable information concerning the past, and useful hints for the future.

Our importation of dry goods at the port of New York during the fiscal year 1864-'65 was less than during the fiscal half what it used to be. This diminution was not altogether due to the exclusion of the South from our markets, for in 1863-'64 there were $83,242,966 of dry goods imported, and in 1862-'63 $61,963,03?. It was the fruit partly of economies forced on the people by the high price of goods, resulting from the depreciation of the currency, and partly of the present high tariff, which to a great extent has driven foreigners out of our markets. Among importers the impression prevails that the foreign dry goods trade will not revive for many years. The duties are so high that our manufacturers can undersell foreigners in almost every branch; and this result, in the ordinary course of events our present tariff will naturally give place in time to one more in harmony with the spirit of the age and the true principles of political economy. But the condition of the Treasury is such, and the peril of disturbing confidence in the national securities so formidable, that a reduction will probably please neither foreigners regain the position they once enjoyed in our dry-goods markets.

On the other hand, if it be probable that our consumption of foreign goods is destined to decline—and the same principles apply to our consumption of other foreign manufactures—it seems also likely that the United States have ceased to be one of the great food-exporting countries of the world. Improved agricultural processes, and the development of steam navigation in the West on the one hand, and on the other, increased taxation and increased population in the United States, are likely to shut out our breadstuffs generally from the ports of Europe. Occasionally, when harvests fail in Europe, or when accident gluts our markets on the sea-board, shipments may be made on the old scale. But while it would probably be found that in an average of years we require all the food we grow for our own consumption, and that New England requires to grow cotton as get it more cheaply from her European neighbors than from us.

The future of the cotton trade is so interwoven with political and economical questions concerning the new labor system of the South, that very little can be safely predicted on the subject. It seems certain that, with the negro in a state of freedom, some years must elapse before the crop reaches the old figures of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 bales. And it is equally certain that, with our present tariff, any considerable consumption will rise much above the old average of 700,000 bales. But between these two figures, all is uncertainty. How much cotton will free negroes agree to raise? How much will New England require to supply cotton goods for 30,000,000 of people, to say nothing of exports to Mexico, South America, and the countries beyond the Cape?

The country is going through a commercial as well as political revolution, and the result of the one may be as astounding as those of the other.

DE SAUTY AND THE OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

IF we should chance to read in the morning paper that the ancient mariner with the albatross around his neck had just landed at the Battery our emotions would be like those with which, in reading of the separations for laying the new Atlantic cable, we observed that "Mr. DE SAUTY is in charge of the electrical condition of the cable for the Great Eastern." This is somewhat cadaverous whose name used to be signed to those depressing dispatches which appeared every morning just after the former experiment had failed, and before the new one. It seemed as if he must be growing gray and mossy—as if far away upon some lonely Nova Scotian or Newfoundland shore he were waiting and waiting and endlessly waiting for shocks from the other side of the sea, while sea-weed climbed over him, and the slimy ooze of the ocean surrounded him, and barnacles fastened to his feet. His figure gradually faded out of all human relations, and we thought of DE SAUTY, or DE SAUTY, or whatever his ancient name may have been, as we think of old stone Tritons in fountains, or antique sea-gods, with broken limbs and obliterated features, sunk upon the margin of the sea.

And now he reappears like the most living of men. The great experiment is to be once more repeated. The Great Eastern is about arriving at Valentia with seven thousand tons of cable in her hold. Her total weight is about twenty-one thousand tons. At Valentia the Terrible and the Sphinx, ships of war, will meet her. The great ship will not come nearer to the coast than twenty or twenty-five miles. Over that distance the cable will be already laid; and when the end of the shore-line is spliced to that of the deep-sea-line, which will take some five hours, she will sail for the American coast at the rate of six miles an hour, and at the season of the year most secure from storms. Along the course on which the cable is to be laid the depth of water is from fifteen to twenty-five hundred fathoms. As the ship proceeds constant messages will be sent backward to the shore; and should all land fates favor, the Great Eastern will arrive upon this side on some day between the 20th of July and the 1st of August, and among her passengers will be MR. DE SAUTY.

In the old legend the melody which had been breathed into the enchanted horn years and years before, suddenly, at the right moment, melted and flowed rapturously forth; and the ancient knights, as if alive, seemed gayly blowing pleasant times. So, let us hope, the wire to which such myriad silent messages were confided will now, in its new form, restore them audibly, and the mythical DE SAUTY will seem once more a living being.

THE NEW SYSTEM.

THERE is no doubt that the ample resources of the magnificent State of Virginia and the advantages of the other Southern States will at last be fully developed. The destruction of the feudal system of society which has blighted those pleasant regions from the beginning leaves a country sparsely peopled and with few of the appliances of modern civilization, but nobly furnished with water ways and power, with the softest climate and a generous soil. To the new body of free laborers native to the soil will be added a large and rapid immigration from the more northern States. The blood of many races will commingle. The genius of an active and industrious people will electrify the sluggishness of feudalism. Capital in large and small sums pouring in and possessing itself of the secrets of labor will bring with it enterprise and knowledge. The country will be covered with small estates—the safety of a nation; with manufactories springing up at the crossroads of cross-roads; churches of a purer doctrine will bless a happier people; and all this will be done naturally, simply, and without violent shocks, at the change of this country wisely use the present golden moment.

It is a time of transition. The present feeble and unskilful men's minds which they are easily possible which will become impracticable a little later. The old forms of society being disturbed and destroyed must be effectually and summarily removed, or the ruins will be no less dangerous than unsightly. It is therefore of the utmost importance that every thing which tends to preserve the ruins should be forbidden, and every thing encouraged which aims to rear the new order. Combinations of capital against labor such as those in Virginia, which threaten to pay five dollars a month to the hands, are merely spiteful efforts to perplex the situation. General HOWARD, Chief of the Freedman's Bureau, has very properly refused to allow his subordinates to prescribe any inflexible terms, while General HARTSUFF has most wisely ordered that no more meetings shall be held within his military jurisdiction to fix a price for the labor of a certain class of workmen; but that in every case the commanding officers of counties shall see that wages paid are reasonably living wages. General TERRY also, as we mentioned last week, has ordered that every innocent citizen of the United States in the State of Virginia shall enjoy perfectly equal rights before the laws, going and coming, and making such contracts as he chooses.

It will be much pleasanter for all concerned if the people of the late rebel section conform their action to the inevitable facts of the case. Indeed their common-sense is fast getting a fair system of labor. A Land Company is also proposed, which will divide half a million of acres of land into 20-acre and one hundred-acre farms, to be sold upon easy terms. And we already hear of intelligent young men at the North and West who propose to buy lands in the Southern States as the very reasonable rates which must long rule there.

The slaveholding class of the Southern States always insisted that emancipation had ruined the West Indies, and they quoted the massacres of St. Domingo as the inevitable consequence of liberty. But even if that were so—and it is not—do not these gentlemen remember that we have just seen in Andersonville, Millen, Salisbury, and Belle Isle the inevitable consequences of slavery. And if they would now give themselves the trouble to read history, and to learn the facts, they would discover that the difficulty in Jamaica, for instance—which was said to afford the most signal illustration of the failure of emancipation—proceeded from the planters and not from the slaves; and that it was the attempt to re-enslave the laborers in St. Domingo which produced what are called "the horrors" of that Island. If the farmers of the Southern States will treat their laboring hands as fairly and squarely as the farmers of the West and East treat theirs, there will be no more trouble than in those States. The colored people are certainly not vicious nor blood-thirsty. If the whites are sensible and honorable, the new system will be established without difficulty.

FRESH RAILROAD MASSACRES.

RAILROAD accidents are again incessant and frightful. They are also criminal. The collision upon the Harlem track between the Harlem and Albany Express was unexcusable. The catastrophe upon the Hudson River road was exasperatingly unnecessary. The slaughters of the last few months at the West are horrible. In the first instance the tracks are laid upon a lofty bridge so near that the tops of the cars struck each other. The only excuse we have seen is that the weight of the trains probably pressed the bridge so as to bring the tracks together. Very possibly; and the consequent collision was probably the occasion of the broken arms of the boys. But such a crime is not to excuse it. Why were the tracks laid so near to each other that such an accident was possible? In the second case the switch-tender had so much to do that he was unable to do every thing, and the thing he could not do on this occasion was to turn the switch. The train was consequently thrown into the river.

The disasters that are escaped also are frightful to contemplate. During a violent gust in short time last night, where a tree fell directly across the track of the Erie Railway just as the express train came thundering up, and the train was barely stopped in time to escape with shocking and terrific scenes of the cars. A few evenings ago as two trains were proceeding upon the same road, the express in front and the local flying only a few minutes behind, a huge willow-tree fell full across the track between them. The second train was fortunately stopped by the fall of the tree but there an instant later the crash would have been fearful—destroying the car upon which it fell, and, of course, hurling the train from the track.

Counting the loss by the Erie road we speak of a habit of planting willow-trees along the line, apparently for ornament. But it is a constant danger to travelers, for no train-master can be able to split and fell than the willow. Indeed any kind of tree should be very sagaciously selected for planting along a railroad track. It is in this kind of observation and public report that the daily travelers by railroads into the city can exercise a wholesome supervision of their condition and security. Travelers may be very sure that if they are not alert and watchful the companies will not be. "Whoever trusts himself to a train should do all he can to insure his own safety and that of his neighbors by reporting every instance of negligence and mismanagement, not merely to the railroad-office but to the papers.

THE STATE OF PARTIES.

FOR the first time there are no political parties in this country. In Vermont the Union Convention pronounces for equal suffrage in the reorganized States, and heartily supports the President. In the same State the "Democratic" Convention resolves that man means white man, denounces colored suffrage, and heartily supports the President. In the chief Committee and the papers of the party, which during the last political campaign slandered Mr. JOHNSON with unparalleled ferocity, and advocated against him the election of a candidate who believed in the right of secession, now wait in trembling hope that the President may not prove to be the man they believed him to be. This state of affairs is due to the fact that the unprecedented condition of the country requires that the policy of the Administration should, for the present, be tentative, and not positive.

Our late party divisions were upon the question of slavery. The Democratic party, under a plea of State rights, was the apologist, defender, and extender of slavery. The Republican party, bearing the opposite, so far as the States were concerned, to the judgment of the States in which it was established, claimed that in the territory belonging to the United States the United States power and should prohibit it. The question was vital. It was really a question of the truth of our principles and the quality of our government. It was a conflict between caste and equal rights—between privilege and, the people, and came, or necessity, to the final decision of arms. The war abolished slavery, and freed the States as well as the Territories. It abolished also the parties founded upon the question of slavery. In the lull after the exhausting controversy of the war the new issues are not very plainly seen. When they are seen, and when the Administration has declared itself, parties will naturally arise.

Thus far the administration of MR. JOHNSON has done nothing but open the ports, issue the amnesty, and appoint provisional governors, upon conditions which refer the reorganization of the rebel States to Congress. In all that the President has said he shows that he regards emancipation as a fixed and final fact. In his proclamations appointing provisional governors his opinion that as a State can not cease to exist, the part of the population which the Constitution of the State at the time of secession recognized as the people must alone be allowed to vote, in the first instance, upon reorganization. But their action is in no sense to be final. In this posture of affairs it is certainly open for every convention to approve the course of the President. But to speak of him as having "TYRANNY" the Administration, or other words, to accuse him of betrayal of the principles upon which he was elected—is mere folly.

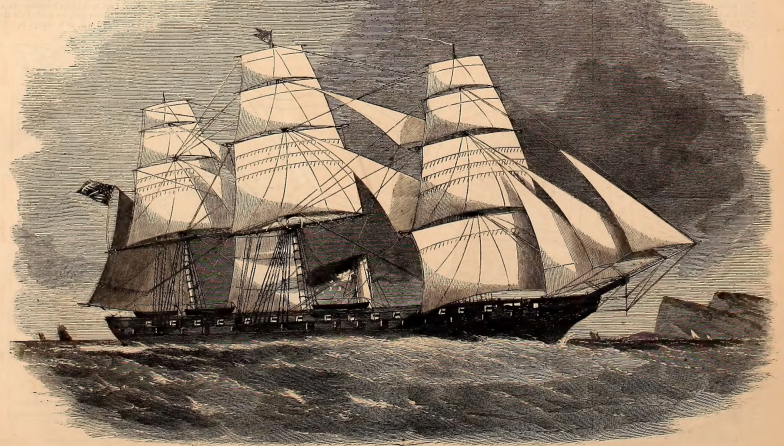
Meanwhile the tactics of the Copperhead politicians are plain. They hope that the political power of the unorganized States will be intrusted exclusively to the white citizens; that hatred of the disloyal citizens will unite the leaders of this power in every Southern State; that with these holders the various fragments of opposition to the Union party in the Northern and Western States will combine, and that the

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT AND STAFF.

MAJOR-GENERAL F. J. OSTERHAUS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GEORGE N. BARNARD.]

ADMIRAL LOUIS M. GOLDSBOROUGH.

THE EUROPEAN SQUADRON.



ON Wednesday, June 21, Admiral GOLDSBOROUGH, on board the flag-ship Colorado, sailed from the Brooklyn Navy-yard to take the command of our European Squadron. Most of the vessels of this squadron are already in European waters. The Kearsarge at latest accounts was at Lisbon. The Niagara and the Sacramento join the fleet, which is destined soon to occupy the waters of the Mediterranean.

The Colorado is a screw frigate, and has been undergoing a thorough repair at the Navy-yard since its last engagement at Fort Fisher. The Frolic accompanied the vessel as tender. Other vessels will join the fleet during the summer.

Admiral LOUIS M. GOLDSBOROUGH, commanding the squadron, was born in the District of Columbia, from which District he received his appointment in the United States Navy. His first entrance into the navy bears date June 13, 1812. He has been more than half a century in the service, over eighteen of which he has passed at sea. After the proclamation instituting a blockade of the Southern ports he was transferred from the Congress to the command of a portion of the Atlantic Blockading Squadron. As naval commander he co-operated with General BURNSIDE in the important battle of Roanoke Island at the beginning of the year 1862. His services on that occasion, his extensive experience in naval affairs, and his perfect mastery of the French and Spanish, fully justify his appointment to the important command which he now assumes.

MAJOR-GENERAL OSTERHAUS.

MAJOR-GENERAL OSTERHAUS, who has been recently appointed to the command of the Mississippi Department, is an officer of the volunteer army. At the battle of Pea Ridge he was simply the Colonel of a regiment. The war has been his only military school—he was never at West Point—and here he has graduated with high honors. He has been from the first connected with the Western army, and from St. Louis to Atlanta he followed the fortunes of that army. In whatever position he has been placed—and he has passed all the grades from the lowest to that of a Major-General—he has contributed in an important degree to nearly every one of our great victories in the West. His name in the history of this war will rank with the noblest.

THE UNITED STATES FRIGATE "COLORADO," FLAG-SHIP OF ADMIRAL GOLDSBOROUGH.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WAUD.]

GETTYSBURG—JULY 4, 1865.

AMONG the many celebrations of our National Anniversary that at Gettysburg takes a prominent place. The ceremonies of the day have a peculiar interest from their connection with the laying of a corner-stone of the Monument in the Soldiers' National Cemetery. The oration on this occasion was delivered by General OLIVER O. HOWARD, prominent among the heroes of the battle of Gettysburg. The following exquisite poem, by Colonel CHARLES G. HALPINE—otherwise known as PRIVATE MILES O'REILLY—was recited:

THOUGHTS OF THE PLACE AND TIME.

As men beneath some load of grief
Or sudden joy will dumbly stand,
Finding no words to give relief—
Clear, passion-warm, complete, and brief—
To thoughts with which their souls expand;
So here to-day—these trophies nigh—
Our lips no fitting words can reach;
The hills around, the graves, the sky—
The silent poem of the eye
Surpasses all the art of speech!

To-day, a Nation meets to build
A Nation's trophy to the dead
Who, living, formed her sword and shield—
The arms she sadly learned to wield
When other hope of peace had fled.
And not alone for those who lie
In honored graves before us blent,
Shall our proud column, broad and high,
Climb upward to the blessing sky,
But for all a monument.

An emblem of our grief, as well
For others as for these, we raise;
For these beneath our feet who dwell,
And all who in the good cause fell
On other fields, in other frays.
To all the self-same love we bear
Which here for marbled memory strives;
No soldier for a wreath would care
Which all true comrades might not share—
Brothers in death as in their lives!

On Southern hill-sides, parched and brown,
In tangled swamp, on verdant ridge,
Where pines and broadening oaks look down,
And jasmine weaves its yellow crown,
And trumpet-creepers clothe the hedge;
Along the shores of endless sand,
Beneath the palms of Southern plains,
Sleep every where, hand locked in hand,
The brothers of the gallant band
Who bare poured life through throbbing veins.

Around the closing eyes of all
The same red glories glared and flew—
The hurrying flags, the bugle-call,
The whistle of the angry ball,
The elbow-touch of comrades true!
The skirmish-fire—a spattering spray;
The snarling growl of fire by file,
The thickening fury of the fray
When opening batteries get in play,
And the lines form o'er many a mile.

The foeman's yell, our answering cheer,
Red flashes through the gathering smoke,
Swift orders, resonant and clear,
Blithe cries from comrades tried and dear,
The shell-scream and the sabre-stroke;
The rolling fire from left to right,
From right to left, we hear it swell;
The headlong charges, swift and bright,
The thickening tumult of the fight
And bursting thunders of the shell.

Now denser, deadlier grows the strife,
And here we yield, and there we gain;
The air with hurtling missiles rife,
Volley for volley, life for life—
No time to heed the cries of pain!
Panting as up the hills we charge,
Or down them as we broken roll,
Life never felt so high, so large,
And never eye so wide a range
To triumph swept the kindling soul!

New raptures waken in the breast
Amid this hell of scene and sound;
The barking batteries never rest,
And broken foot, by horsemen pressed,
Still stubbornly contest their ground.
Fresh waves of battle rolling in
To take the place of shattered waves;
Torn lines that grow more bent and thin—
A blinding cloud, a maddening din—
'Twas thus wars filled these very graves!

* * * * *

Night falls at length with pitying veil—
A moonlit silence on the dead;
These upturned faces, stained and pale,
Vainly the chill night dews assail—
For colder than the dews their flesh!
And flickering far through brush and wood
Go searching-parties, torch in hand—
"Seen if you can some wretch and food,
At dawn the fight will be renewed,
Sleep on your arms!" the hushed command.

They talk in whispers as they lie
In line—these rough and weary men;
"Dead or but wounded?" then a sigh;
"No coffee either!" "Guess we'll try
To get those two guns back again."
"We five flags to their one! oho!"
"That bridge—'twas hot there as we passed!"
"The colonel dead! It can't be so;
Wounded and badly—that I know;
But he kept saddle to the last."

"Be sure to send it if I fall—"
"Any success?" Bill, have you?"
"A brown-haired, blue-eyed, laughing doll—"
"Good-night, boys, and God keep you all!"
"What! sound asleep? Guess I'll sleep too."
"Yes, just about this hour they pray
For Dad—." "Stop talking! pass the word!"
And soon as quiet as the clay
Which thousands will but be next day
The long-drawn sighs of sleep are heard.

* * * * *

Oh, men! to whom this sketch, though rude,
Calls back some scene of pain and pride;
Oh, widow! hugging close your brood,
Oh, wife! with happiness renewed,
Since he again is at your side;
This trophy that to-day we raise
Should be a monument for all;
And on its sides no niggard phrase
Confine a generous Nation's praise
To those who here have chanced to fall.

But let us all to-day combine
Still other resources to raise;
Here for the Dead we build a shrine;
And now to those who, crippled, pine
Let us give hope of happier days!
Let Homes for these sad wrecks of war
Through all the land with speed arise;
Tongues cry from every gaping scar,
"Let not our brother's tomb delay
Th' wounded living from your eyes."

A noble day, a deed as good,
A noble spot on which 'tis done,
The Birthday of our Nationhood:
And here again the Nation stood
On this same day—its life re-won!

A bloom of banners in the air,
A double calm of sky and soul;
Triumphal chant and bugle blare,
And green fields, spreading bright and fair,
While heavenward our Hosannas roll.

Hosannas for a land redeemed.
The bayonet sheathed, the cannon dumb;
Passed, as some horror we have dreamed,
The fiery meteors that here streamed,
Threatening within our homes to come!
Again our banner floats abroad,
Gone the one stain that on it fell—
And, bettered by His chastening rod,
With streaming eye uplift to God
We say, "HE DOETH ALL THINGS WELL."

OUR NEW BEARER.

A TALE OF LIFE IN CALCUTTA.

IN a not very long residence in Calcutta we had changed our bearer (for we only kept one) several times. The first that we had took advantage of our ignorance as new-comers to prefer his own case to our interests; but as we grew wiser and more experienced we discovered this failing, and at once gave him his dismissal with the devil their flesh! and flickering far through brush and wood and flickering on which he could lay his hands), and as we felt that the requirements of his conscience and our service could not be satisfied by the same individual, we accordingly gave him warning. Shortly before the departure of bearer No. 2 an applicant for his place arrived. Making the usual salam he handed me his chitits or written testimonials of service, which were very satisfactory. I was on the point of engaging him, when my wife interrupted me by begging me not to do so, as she thought he had a bad countenance, and was certain no good would come of it.

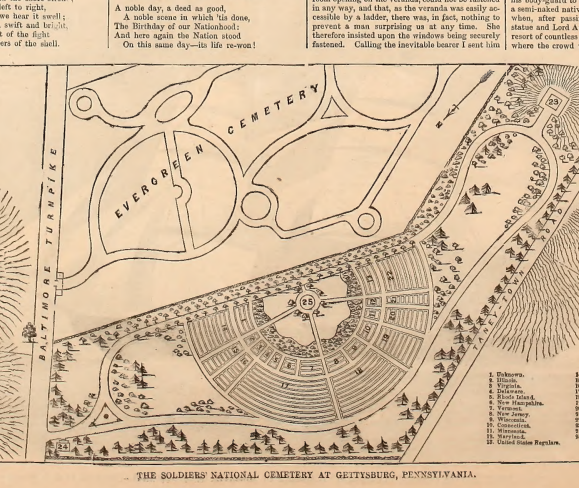
"Why, Alice," I said, "what good can you expect? So long as the man does his work, and obeys my orders, we require nothing more. We shall have no nonsense about caste with him; and, at all events, if we find we don't like him, we can easily get rid of him."

My wife was silent, but not (I fancied) convinced. After a pause she said, "Well, engage him if you choose; but to please me, lock your revolver, for when you are away I shall be terrified if that man is sitting at the door and I have nothing to protect myself with."

Having finished breakfast my wife proposed that we should invite the Barlows to dinner for the next night. Major and Mrs. Barlow had been long in India. During the mutiny they were at Seikhie, where they fortunately escaped being murdered when the native troops broke out there. They had been fellow-passengers with us from England, and we had formed a friendship with them on the voyage which had been thoroughly cemented in Calcutta, where we had derived the greatest benefit from their kindness and experience. I gave a ready assent to her proposal, and she wrote Mrs. Barlow a note and sent it by the bearer, who quickly returned with an answer accepting our invitation, and saying they would call for us to drive with them on the course, for they knew we preferred their carriage to our own humble but more economical buggy.

The short period of our residence in India had not dispelled the timidity my wife naturally felt on her arrival, and she had soon noticed that the shutters of the four drawing-room windows, and of the bathroom opening on the veranda, could not be fastened in any way, and that, as the veranda was easily accessible by a ladder, there was, in fact, nothing to prevent a man surprising us at any time. She therefore insisted upon the windows being securely fastened. Calling the inevitable bearer I sent him at once to fetch a native bandsmith. After about two hours' absence, which was, of course, plausibly explained by the "mild Hindoo," he returned with the man, who, under our personal inspection, firmly fastened rings and staples upon every window in the drawing-room and bath-room I remunerated the man by giving him about a quarter of what he asked, when he retired, no doubt quite satisfied that he had cheated us in spite of the reduction.

In the evening I fastened every window with padlocks that I had brought from England, and we passed the night in safety, though my wife fancied once that she heard a noise on the veranda. In the morning our new bearer made his appearance; there was nothing remarkable in his manner, he seemed, for a native, to do his work very well.



Before we went for our early drive he remarked that the windows were fastened, and asked for the keys, but at a pleading look from my wife I unlocked them all myself except that between the bath-room and veranda, which I decided to keep permanently locked as it was very seldom used.

I well remember the drive we took that morning, and, indeed, every incident of the day. The heat was very great when we returned, about eight A.M., and we were glad of the shade and comparative cold of our drawing-room. After breakfast we settled down to our usual occupations, for it was a day on which I was not compelled to be absent. We sent the bearer with sundry orders; to Wilson's for ice, and to another shop for confectionery for the dessert. He made no scruple about carrying the parcels, at which we were pleased; for our dismissed bearer had on several occasions gone to the length of engaging a coolly to carry them for him; a system of which I showed my disapproval by invariably deducting the coolly hire from his monthly wages, so that if he chose to pay the great man it was at his expense and not mine.

During the day I cleaned my revolver, which was thoroughly out of order and very rusty. My wife reminded me of my promise to load it, and as she still begged me to do so, I loaded all the chambers and capped it, saying that I hoped she would now be content, for she was secure against any six men. She interrupted me by crying "Some one is looking through the curtain. It is moving now."

In front of the door a curtain was hung, and we usually kept the door open, with a screen partially before it. The curtain certainly was moving, so I went to the door, but as I found no one I came back suggesting that it was probably some box, valise, or itinerant peddler, a class of men who visit all the European houses in Calcutta, offering for sale stationery, eau-de-cologne, and other nick-nacks, which by purchasing from captains of merchantmen in want of ready money, they are able to sell at a far lower rate than the English shops. Though these men generally announce their arrival by calling out, "Any thing want, sahib? I all things got, eau-de-cologne got, envelopes got, etc., you sometimes they peep through the curtain to see if any one is in, and one had probably done so on this occasion, for he might not have seen us where we were sitting. Our bearer had gone for his dinner, so that we had no servant at the door.

At half past five in the evening one of the Barlows' syces came to tell us that his sahib and memsahib were waiting below in their carriage. My wife threw a shawl over her white dress, while I sacrificed at the altar of fashion by putting on a black coat and the inevitable chimney-pot hat. We then started for the Course, meeting and passing conveyances of every description, from the Governor-General's four-in-hand and scarlet escort of the body-guard to the rickety gharri driven by a semi-naked native. The sun was nearly setting, when, after passing Lord Hastings's equestrian statue and Lord Auckland's humbler one, both the resort of countless crows, we reached the river side, where the crowd was, as it always is, very great.

THE SOLDIERS' NATIONAL CEMETERY AT GETTYSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

The fine band of the ——Highlanders was playing in the Eden Gardens, where natives were selling roses at an anna a bunch, and numbers of fair but pale English children were playing with their dark bearers and ayahs, or buying the ingenious toys which are always to be purchased on the maidan. After listening to the music for a short time, Mrs. Barlow proposed that we should drive round the plain; the dear one (the order to the coachman (as the driver is always called in India), and we soon passed the water-gate of Fort William and the Maharajpore memorial, and leaving the crown behind us "tearing the air," as the phrase is, found ourselves in comparative quiet.

The syces lighted the lamps, as it was now dark, and we proceeded. The conversation turned upon the mutiny, as it nearly always does in Anglo-Indian society; and Major Barlow related some circumstances connected with the firing at Seaforde.

"There was a Hindoo sepoy" (he said), "whose name I forget, to whom our surgeon had been very kind when in hospital, who professed to be in our interests, and gave us information about the feeling and intentions of the native regiments. We entirely confided in him, and when at last the villainous, by his advice the surgeon and his wife, I, with my wife and child, and one or two more, ensconced ourselves in a kitchen apart from the military lines, and this sepoy promised that when the mutineers left for Delhi he would return again and take us to escape. You may imagine the terrible suspense of those hours of waiting; fancies were rising on all sides, and firing was heard at short intervals. We were, of course, well-armed, but if we were discovered, we knew that any resistance we could offer would soon be overcome. At last evening came, and we heard low voices near the place of our concealment. I mounted on a table with a revolver in my hand, but on looking through a small window I perceived to those below that it was all right, for that there were only two men, and one of them was our friendly sepoy. I was on the point of addressing him when I heard him say to his companion, 'There, Abdul, the dogs are hidden, thinking that I would be faithful to their salt; they have trusted in me, but their raj is over. Call our brothers, Abdul, and let us complete our work before dark.'

"Betrayed and placed in our slaughter-house by the butcher, what could we do? I could certainly fire, but against the sepoy I could not. There was, however, no time to be lost; I steadied my hand on the window-sill and fired twice in rapid succession. They both fell; dead, I have little doubt, and we were once more comparatively secure. That night we made our escape, and after an exciting journey reached Allahabad in safety. I always congratulate myself on having wrecked such speedy vengeance on that traitorous scoundrel."

By this time we were passing the cathedral, and in a few minutes were set down at our own door. The Barlows, who were very near neighbors, went to dress, and returning in about half an hour, we ushered into the drawing-room by our new bearer.

"You have got a new man, I see, Mrs. Major; "I mean to know the fellow's face very well. He has quite a military look." He asked him if he had ever served in the army, and the man, now serving his head, answered that he had always been a bearer. Major Barlow then inquired if he had ever seen him (the Major) before; but he turned to me and said that the sahib was quite a stranger to him. "Well," said the Major, "I know I have seen him somewhere." And Mrs. Barlow remarked that the man seemed very familiar to her, and that she fancied that she must have seen some one like him in the Punjab.

A khitmutghar with clasped hands announced that dinner was on the table, so our quarters not burned in the dining-room. I remember after-ward that the bearer went into my bath-room. The dinner passed off very pleasantly, as small dinners in India generally do, succeeding where "burra khanas," or grand dinner-parties, often fail. The heat had been very oppressive, and a dust-storm, followed by a heavy shower, had cooled the air; and when, after dessert, ladies and gentlemen leaving the table together according to the Indian etiquette, we went on the veranda to see what we could of a display of fire-works in the Eden Gardens, we found the night breeze very agreeable. With music and singing the evening passed pleasantly away; and Mrs. Barlow pronounced most favorably upon our present rooms as contrasted with our old ones. "But," said she, "were I you, Mrs. ——, I should be rather afraid at the thought of two-thirds of the house being uninhabited. Mind we don't read in the Harkaru some morning of a fearful tragedy at No. 18."

"Oh," replied my wife, "I certainly was very timid, but I persuaded my husband to load his revolver, and now I feel quite secure, for I shall keep it myself on an emergency; so if you hear a shot from this quarter mind you send the Major here at once."

"But, seriously," said her husband, "you are perfectly safe; for as the great gates are shut at night no one could get into the compound, and if there were any one to attack you it must be one of the servants, and I can hardly fancy that a Bengali has the necessary pluck. He will not be in the Punjab——" And here the Major commenced a long dissertation upon the superiority of the Punjab and every thing in it, to others inhabited by the effeminate provinces of Lower Bengal.

It is a curious fact that every one in India seems to consider it a point of honor to maintain the superiority over every other of the particular station, district, and presidency in which (by accident or accident) the greater portion of his Indian career has been passed. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers have been the scene of many a hot argument between the advocates of Madras and Bengal. The Qui hyes (koi hai), as the latter are called, always professing to look down upon those whose lot has been cast in the Benighted Presidency (Madras).

At the conclusion of his harangue Mrs. Barlow remarked that it was very late, and that they must really leave. As it was a lovely moonlight night, and they lived so near, we walked with them to the door, where we wished them good-night.

While looking, on our return, at the familiar constellations of Orion, the Pleiades, and the Great Bear, we could almost have fancied ourselves at home had not the howl of the jackal and the strange shouts of native servants going to their quarters (or huts) after their day's work quickly dispelled any such rising thoughts.

On rejoining our rooms the servants, as usual, asked our permission to depart; for we did not, as many do, insist upon their sleeping outside the door. As all their work was done I, of course, assented, and they left us with the usual salam.

We sat talking and working for above an hour—quite alone, as we did not have a night-watch. I then fastened the drawing-room door which led to the staircase, and proceeded to publish the news of the four orders-in-council on the veranda. Having done so I remarked that we were safely barricaded again, when my wife reminded me that I had not fastened the bath-room shutter. "That, I said, "I left locked this morning; it is so seldom used that I thought I would not disturb you through the form of locking and unlocking it every day."

"Oh," said she, "to please me, go and see that it is all right; you know I shall not sleep if you don't. Please go at once; it will not take a minute."

"Well," I said, "I will go and look now, but don't expect me to do it every night; for there is really not the slightest occasion." I took up a lamp and went into the dressing-room into the bath-room, and my wife went with me.

There," I cried, "is the window locked and secure. Go and sleep in peace. Then I hope you will be satisfied."

She laughed, and owned it was very foolish, but going to the window pulled the padlock, when, to our astonishment and consternation, the staple fell from the casing of the door, and the padlock remained in her hand.

She turned very white, and, trembling all over, said, "Oh, dear, dear, how little doubt, and how badly the blacksmith must have fastened it! Why did not you try every staple when he had finished?"

"Indeed, I did so," I replied, "and they were as firm as possible. I remember thinking what a capital workman he was. Don't be alarmed, my love, no time to be lost; I steadied my hand on the window-sill and fired twice in rapid succession. They both fell; dead, I have little doubt, and we were once more comparatively secure. That night we made our escape, and after an exciting journey reached Allahabad in safety. THE SOUTHERN UNIONIST.

Up the street of the Southern town,
Where the smooth white poplar and locust grew,
The Union red-rose, dusty and brown,
Went strolling along as soldiers do.

Not as you see them when on parade,
When each face is grave and each voice is still,
But laughing loud at the jokes they made,
Sauntering idly with arms at will.

On either side of the streets the crowds,
With awaiting faces, looked on the while;
And high overhead in the sky the clouds
Were bright with the Southern rose's warm smile.

The leaves of the poplars with dust were brown,
And the sky was charged with the noonday heat,
As the Union soldier strolled through the town,
Sauntering idly along the street.

Sauntering idly with arms at will,
In that careless way, veteran style:
The squealing fife and the drums were still:
Not a note of music was heard the while.

When all of a sudden a regiment band
Struck up with trumpet and fife and drum
That anthem dear to the Yankee land—
Dear to each heart that loves his home.

Long years had passed since its notes rang through
The shadowy streets of that Southern town,
And each stalwart face on the sidewalks grew
Darker yet with an added frown.

But one there was to whose longing ear
That tune was welcome as summer rain,
And his life-blood thrilled in his veins to hear
Its theology once in those streets again.

For months and years in that Southern town
He had waited to see that welcome day,
With every pulse in his breast kept down
By the tyrant Treason's bullying sway.

But when at last in the crowded street
That tune rang out so loud and clear,
His heart was full of wild joy then,
And his voice broke forth in a ringing cheer.

O Yankee Doodle, anthem of our land!
The spirit-stirring, good by one imparts
Given strength in war to every freeman's hand,
And fires the native valor of our hearts.

CHAPTER XXII.

TELEMACHUS SHOWS THAT HE HAS A WILL OF HIS OWN.

Unlike the great ocean, which, however racked by hurricane and storm, sleeps in eternal calm but a few days by beneath the tossing navies, Mr. Trefalden kept all his tempests down below, and presented to the world a surface of unvary ing equanimity. No man ever knew what went on under that "glassy cool exterior. Cyclone might rage in the far depths of his nature, and those who were looking in his face saw no ripple, heard no echo, of the strife within. It was just thus when Saxon burst in upon him at about eleven o'clock that Tuesday morning, fearful of compassion for the perplexities of the house of Greatorex, and burning to relieve them at the moderate cost of fifty-nine thousand pounds ster ling.

Mr. Trefalden was furious; but he smiled, nevertheless, and heard Saxon quite patiently from beginning to end of his story.

"In this is pure nonsense and Quixotism," said he, when the young man came to a pause for want of breath. "What's Greatorex to you, or you to him, pray? Why should you so reck lessly sacrifice a sum which is in itself a hand some fortune to oblige a man who has no claim whatever on your sympathies or your purse?"

"I can't let him be ruined!" cried Saxon, impetuously.

"Indeed! why not? He would not have hes itated to ruin you. He would have swept your whole property into his rotten bank if he could, and have left you one per cent. less than the established rate of interest."

"I can't tell how that may be," said Saxon, "but I know him for check, and he acted on the faith of my signature. I must not let him suffer for it."

"But he would have suffered sooner or later. Did I not tell you last night that the Greatorexes were on the eve of bankruptcy, and that I be lieved they must stop payment before the week was out? Don't you remember that?"

"Yes, I remember it."

"Then you must surely see that your check can be in no sense the cause of their ruin? At the worst it but hastens the event by a few days."

"I see that I have no right, and, Heaven knows, no wish, to hasten it by a single hour."

"But, my dear Saxon—"

"But, my dear cousin William, Lawrence Greatorex has an old father and two sisters, and he and I have been on terms of good fellowship together for weeks past, and I'm determined to stand by him."

"Oh, if you are determined, Saxon, that puts an end to the matter," said Mr. Trefalden, coldly.

"But in this, why consult me at all?"

"I didn't come to consult you, cousin; but I had given you my word not to sign away any more money until after Thursday, and I felt bound to let you know what I was about to do."

Mr. Trefalden looked very grave.

"I confess that I am disappointed," he said.

"I had hoped to find my opinion more valued by you, Saxon. I had also hoped that you would look upon me as something more than your law yer—as your friend, adviser, guide."

"Why, so I do!" cried the young man, eagerly.

"Pardon me; I do not think so."

"When you do me injustice; for I put a price less value on your opinion and your friendship."

"Your present willfulness disproves your words, Saxon," said his cousin.

"I know it does; but then I also know that I am acting upon impulse, and not according to the laws of worldly wisdom. I have no doubt that you are perfectly right, and that I am ut terly wrong—but still I can not be happy if I do not for once indulge my folly."

Seeing that it was useless to push the argu ment further, Mr. Trefalden smiled in his pleas antest manner.

"Let it go, think," said he, "that you are the most foolish fellow in the world. If I don't make haste to fix your money up, you will ruin yourself, rich as you are!"

"But what's the use of being rich if I may not enjoy my wealth as I please?" cried the laughing Saxon, delighted to have carried his point.

"Your way is a very irrational way," replied the lawyer, inducing a slip of paper from his desk, and writing upon it in a clear engrossing hand. "Almost as irrational as that of the poor sailors who make sandwiches of their bank-notes and bread-and-butter. But I suppose I must forgive you for this once; and, after all, the loss of fifty nine thousand is better than the loss of a quarter of a million. There, put that in your purse, and see that your devoted friend signs it down there at the bottom."

"What is it?"

"A promissory note for the money. He will, perhaps, favor us with a receipt on the part of the firm; but this will answer the purpose much better, will it not—prudently?"

Saxon explained that Greatorex wanted the cash before one o'clock.

"You have observed the 'stop' from Drum mond's, I suppose?"

"Not yet. I will call there as I go home."

"And Mr. Greatorex has given you back your first check?"

"I don't know. I think we left it on the breakfast-table."

Mr. Trefalden bit his lip.

"Upon my soul, Saxon," he said, "you de serve to be his own worst friend, and cut his throat with a razor, if you will, and run away! and upon this one object he concentrated the whole force of his sluggish but powerful will. For had Keckwitch met a hater after Byron's own heart, and loved to nurse his wrath, and brood over it, and keep it warm, he could not have used that doorway in Chancery Lane without rehears ing the whole scene in his mind. He remem bered every thundering word that Mr. Trefal den had hurled at him in those three or four moments. He still felt the iron blow, the breath less shock, the burning sense of rage and humi liation; and these things rankled day by day in the respectable bosom of Abel Keckwitch, and were each day nourished and farther from being forgiven and forgotten.

The secret, however, remained as dark as ever. He had failed once or twice of late, it is true, to be on the verge of some discovery; but he had each time found himself misled by his suspicions, and so far off as ever from the truth.

Hope deferred, and wrath long cherished, be gan at length to tell upon Mr. Keckwitch's health and spirits. He became morose and moody. He gave up practicing the violoncello. * He lost his appetite for the eternal meats of High Holborn, and his relish for the leaders that he was wont to devour with his cheese; and he forgot to take notice of his cut. His landlady and his fel low-clerks saw and marveled at the change; and the soul of the one-eyed waiter who received Mr. Keckwitch during dubs was agonized with him; but none dared to question him. They observed him from afar off, as the Greeks looked upon Achilles sitting sullenly beside his ships, and can vassed his mood "with bated breath and whis pering humbleness."

This was on for weeks; and then, all at once, the tide turned, and Mr. Keckwitch became him self again. An idea had occurred to him—a bright idea, like the light of which he silently saw the path to success opening out before him. He only wondered that he had not thought of it sooner.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE WATERLOO-BRIDGE STATION.

Saxon Trefalden knew his buoyant spirits that afternoon as he wandered to and fro among the intricate platforms of the Waterloo-bridge sta tion, and were-hunted for the departure of the trains. He had plenty of time; for he was a very inexperienced traveler, and, in his anxiety to be punctual, had come half an hour too soon. But his mind was full of pleasant thoughts, and he enjoyed the life and bustle of the place with as much zest as if the whole scene were a comedy played for his amusement.

He was very happy. He thought, as he went strolling up and down, that he had scarcely ever felt so happy in his life.

In the first place, he had that day received a letter from Bertha Martin—a long, loving, pious letter, filled with sweet home news, and benevo lent projects about good things to be done in the valley of Domlesch. The remittance which he had dispatched the very day after he drew his first check had been distributed among the poor of the neighboring parishes: the organ that he had sent out a fortnight since had arrived, and the workmen were busy with it in the old farm buildings at Rotzberg were being repaired, and the three meadows down by the river-side, that had been so long for sale, were now bought in Saxon's name, and added to the little demesne. The pigeons, too, had a new pigeon-house; and the spotted cow had calved; and the thrushes that built last year in the great laurel down at the end of the garden had again made their nest in the branches of the same tree. These were trifles; but to Saxon, who loved his far-away home with a child's love, and all the surroundings of his boyhood with the passionate enthusiasm of a mountaineer, they were trifles infinitely precious and delightful. And, besides all this, the letter ended with a tender blessing that had rested upon his heart ever since he read it, and seemed to hallow all the sunshine of the April day.

Then, in the second place, he had that morning enjoyed the supreme luxury of doing good. William Trefalden had, it is true, affirmed that the hours of Greatorex & Greatorex were numbered, and that Saxon's fifty-nine dollars could only procure a brief delay between the bankers and the ruin; but Lawrence Greatorex, with the crisp decision of action in his hand, had assured him that this sum, by renewing their credit and tiding them over the present emergency, was certain ultimately to be the firm. Taking it on the whole, this matter of the check had been sufficiently disagreeable. It had shown the banker's disposition in an unfavorable point of view, and to withdraw from even a part of his rash promise had been a source of humiliation to Saxon. Perhaps, too, the young man could not help liking his friend somewhat less than before; and this is at all times a painful feeling. Himself one of nature's own gentlemen, he shrank instinctively from all that was coarse and mercenary; and he could not shut his eyes to the fact that Greatorex had shown himself to be both. However, it had ended pleasantly. Saxon had saved his friend, and the banker had not even overwhelmed him with professions of gratitude, but given him a proper acknowledgment for the money, so that William Trefalden's promissory note (which Saxon knew he should never have produced, though he had lost every penny by the omission) was promptly not needed after all.

And in the third place, he was going into the country for a week or ten days. That was the best and happiest of all. After six weeks of pestilent London life—six long, dazzling, breathless, wonderful weeks—he felt his heart leap at the thought of the fresh air and open sky. He felt the need to be up and out again at gray dawn, with a gun on his shoulder and a log at his heels. He longed to feel that turf under his feet; and, above all, to practice the art of horsemanship in some more favorable locality than the yard of the Mulberry-school, or the crowded passage of Rotten Row. To this end he had a couple of thoroughbreds and a groom with him, and had just passed the animals briefly disposed of in a horse-box, ready to join the train as soon as it was backed into the station.

So Saxon was in great spirits, and went round and about, looking at the book-stalls and the hurrying passengers, and thinking what a pleasant thing it was to have youth, riches, friends, and all the world of books and art before one! There were, in truth, a great many half-formed projects floating about his brain just now—vague pictures of a yachting tour in the Mediterranean; visions of Rome, and Naples, and the isles of Greece; glimpses of the Nile, and the Pyramids, and even of the white domes of Jerusalem. Some of these schemes Lord Castletowers was answerable, but, let the foreground be what it might, the familiar scenery of the Rhenish Alps closed in the distance of every wondrous landscape that Saxon's vivid imagination bodied forth. He had no thought of wandering into Italy without first revisiting the valley of Domlesch; and still less did he ever dream of making his permanent home away from that still, primitive, untrodden place. But he had projects about that also, and meant some day to build a beautiful commodious chateau not so large, but much more beautiful than Count Plaats's), and to rebuild the church, and throw a new bridge over the Rhine, and erect model cottages, and make every one happy around him.

"Well, what is it?" said an authoritative voice. "Any thing the matter?"

Saxon was looking at the red and gold backs of a long row of Traveler's Guides on a bookstand close by, and the voice broke in abruptly on the pleasant reverie which their titles had suggested. He turned, and saw a dark, sly, way gaud, and a burly-looking official with a pen behind his ear, standing at the door of an empty second-class carriage of the up-train which had discharged its freight of passengers three or four minutes ago.

The guard touched his cap.

"Lady's lost her ticket, Sir," he replied, with a knowing twinkle of the eye.

"I know I had it when the train stopped at Weybridge," said the lady. "I took it out from my purse, because I thought the guard was going to ask to see it."

Her voice trembled a little as she said this, stooping forward into the carriage all the while, in search of the missing ticket.

The burly official drew his hand across his mouth, and chuckled doubtfully.

"Where did you take it from, miss?" he asked.

"From Sedgebrook station."

The name came familiarly to Saxon's ear, for it happened that Sedgebrook was precisely the point to which Lord Castletowers had directed him to take his own ticket.

"Humph! Well, Salter, I suppose you've searched the carriage thoroughly?"

"Quite thoroughly, Sir," replied the guard.

The official went through the form of peering into it himself, and said,

"Then, miss, I'm afraid there's no help for it."

"Shall I have to pay the fare a second time?" asked the lady, nervously.

"You'll have to pay it from Exeter—the point where the train started from."

"From Exeter? But I only came from Sedgebrook!"

"Can't help that, miss. Those are our regulations. Any passenger unable to produce his ticket on alighting, must pay his full fare from the point of departure. This train comes from Exeter, and from Exeter you must pay. There 's no help for it, unless you can find the ticket yourself."

Her face was turned toward Saxon now, as she stood by the carriage-door, looking from the one man to the other. It was a very young face, quite childlike in its appeal—timidity, and appeal as a lily.

"Thank you," she said, hurriedly, "I don't want to see it. I am quite satisfied with what you say. How much will it be?"

"One pound five."

The pale face became scarlet, and the childlike eyes filled with sudden tears.

"Oh dear!" she said, piteously, "what shall I do? I have not nearly so much money as that!"

Saxon had seen that she was poorly dressed, and he knew, as well as if he had looked into it, that her slender purse could ill spare even the paltry three shillings and sixpence to the booking-brook to London. His hand had been in his waistcoat pocket half a dozen times already, and the easy withdrawn empty became he felt that it would be a simple impertinence to interpose. But now he could bear it no longer.

"May I be permitted, madam," he said, bowing to the young girl as profoundly as if she were a princess of the blood royal, "to arrange this matter for you?"

And he slipped her fare into the hand of the guard.

The blush deepened painfully upon her cheek.

"I—I thank you, Sir," she faltered. "I thank you very much, indeed. I will send you the money as soon as I get home, that I may know where to send the money?"

Saxon felt in his pockets, looked in his purse, and found that he had not the vestige of a card about him. At this moment a bell rang on the opposite platform, and a porter began to be interested with his railway rug and the task of securing him a seat, came running breathlessly up.

"Train's just a going, Sir," said he. "You're not a minute to lose."

So Saxon bowed again, stammered something about being "very sorry," and vanished from the scene.

Just as he had taken his seat, however, and the train had begun to move, the guard appeared at the window, tossed in a card, said something which was lost in the hubbub of the driver's whistle, and dropped out of sight.

Saxon picked up the card, which was rather small for a lady's use, and read:

MISS RIVIÈRE,

PHOTOGRAPHIC COLOURIST,

6 Bridstell Terrace, Camberwell.

"Poor little thing!" he said to himself, with a pitying smile, "does she suppose that I will send to her for the money? Not likely!"

And then he was about to throw it out of the window; but checked himself, looked at it again, and put it in his waistcoat pocket instead.

"She was very pretty," thought he; "and her voice was very sweet. How glad I am that I had no card about me!"

TALMUDIC LEGENDS.

WHEN scholars want light reading, and are tired, as they become very speedily, of the sensation novels on Mr. Mudie's list, they turn for amusement in the most unexpected quarters. We are discovering about in pleasant by-ways, of which the ordinary purchaser at a railway bookstall has no inkling whatsoever. Great folios, which look as if they were meant to terrify intending readers away, stout vellum-bound quarto, and octavo tomes, not to the multitude of quaint little duodecimos in minute but marvelously legible type, which poured from the Continental presses of the seventeenth century, all often yield hours of interest to those who have been bored to satisfy with mysterious women in all manner of dresses, and with feminine views as to the bearing of judicial proceedings on everyday life.

No direction in which to look for amusement, pure and simple, seems so surprising as theology; no theology would appear so unlikely to afford an exception to the rule as that of the sombre Jews of the dispersion. But the most terrible docility to pay so deterrent as that which is at once the magazine of legal glosses on the Mosaic code and of elaborate commentaries on the Biblical writings. And yet, scattered through the many ponderous tomes in which that singular work the Talmud lumps out its chaff at Babylon some thirteen hundred years ago) is contained, many singular legends, witty sayings, and quaint stories which, in the hands of a small merit, and eminently capable of entertaining as well as instructing; while at rarer intervals some of the grand and fervid flashes of poetry are found out in solemn prayers and invocations.

Example is, however, better than dissertation, and a few specimens of the latter are here called and set before the reader.

The following has a savor of the Arabian Nights.

Once upon a time there was a good man, full of love and charity, but in great poverty. There came a year of frightful scarcity, and the poor man lived in the most intolerable manner with his family. When the great festival of the New Year came he procured those things of which there was the most absolute need for his family, which still possessed some scanty funds. A poor wretch, thin, ragged, barefoot, and hungry, came to him and asked him for help. The good man took the money he had left and gave it to the mendicant. When his wife returned from market she was scolded, raged, and stormed, and gave him no peace. Worried and deafened, he rushed out of the house, and fled to a cemetery to recover himself. There he lay down on his father's tomb, and burst out into prayers and lamentations, while all around him was the silence of the grave. In this solemn stillness no other voice was heard than the subdued murmuring and choking sobs of the man who was stretched upon the tomb, from the depth of which a sudden croaking noise came, and a low ghostly whisper reached the mourner's ears. He ceased his prayers and lamentations, and listened attentively.

"Come, my companion," said a voice, "hasten from the cavity; let us make our flight toward the celestial spheres, and, concealed behind the veils of heaven, listen to hear what destinies await mortals this year."

"Let us go," replied the other voice, "I am prisoned here in this cane-matting, nor is it permitted me to free myself from the tomb. Go, fly, Sandalon, and bring me news thou hast heard."

And the first spirit departed, flew up, listened, and returned. "Companion, what hast thou heard behind the curtain of heaven?" "Whoever sows after the second rains will have abundant harvests this year. Thus I heard it in heaven above." The second man sprang up, elated with what he had discovered, sowed after the second rains, and alone of all had an abundant crop. His wife wondered at his singular success, and asked her husband the cause of his good fortune. He told the method of evading the question, and told every thing to his wife as it had happened. Now it chanced that the lady had a married sister, and a poorer one than she was. She married sister, and a poorer one than she was. HOLIDAY IN CAMP—SOLDIERS PLAYING "FOOT-BALL."—[SKETCHED BY WINSLOW HOMER.]

MOST REVEREND HENRY EDWARD MANNING, D.D., ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER, ENGLAND.

JOSEPH CRELE, THE OLDEST MAN IN THE WORLD, ÆT. 130.—[PHOT. BY JOLLEY, POSTAGE CITY.]

ARCHBISHOP MANNING, OF WESTMINSTER.

THE Most Rev. HENRY EDWARD MANNING, whom the Pope has appointed to succeed the late Cardinal WISEMAN in the Roman Catholic archbishopric of Westminster, was born at Totteridge, near Barnet, on July 15, 1808, being the son of Mr. WILLIAM MANNING, a London merchant, who was for some time a member of Parliament. He was educated at Harrow School, and at Balliol College, Oxford, where he entered as an undergraduate in 1827; he took a first class and his degree of B.A. in Michaelmas Term, 1830, and was soon afterward elected a Fellow of Merton College; he was also for some time one of the select preachers in the University of Oxford. He resigned his fellowship in 1833, and took the vicarage of Lavington, near Midhurst, in Sussex, to which was added, in 1840, the appointment of Archdeacon of Chichester, and he held these offices in the Protestant Established Church of England till 1851, when he announced his conversion to the Roman Catholic system. Having received ordination as priest from the hands of Cardinal WISEMAN, Mr. MANNING went to Rome and became a student of theology in the college of the Academia, where he remained till 1854. He then returned to England, and undertook an active propagandist mission in that country. The degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the Pope, who also, in 1857, appointed him Provost of Westminster and of St. Mary's, Moorfields. Dr. MANNING is the author of many published sermons, a treatise on the Unity of the Church, and another on the Temporal Power of the Pope. His consecration as Archbishop took place June 8, with the usual pomp and ceremony, in the Church of St. Mary, Moorfields. Our portrait represents Archbishop MANNING in the costume of his new office.

On the Sabbath after his consecration the Archbishop's first pastoral letter was read in the churches of his diocese. This letter is a remarkable pronunciamento. It savors somewhat of arrogance for a prelate at this time, and in England, to speak of the Roman Catholic faith as one "out of which is no salvation;" to assume the propagandism of that faith is the work of God, and to boldly declare that the Bull of the Immaculate Conception and the Encyclical letter of the Pope marks "an epoch in the reconstitution of the Christian order of the world." Dr. MANNING assumes that the protest made by the human intellect against this unreasoning absolutism of the Papacy is "the derision of the nineteenth century," which will be buried with the heresies of the last eighteen.

The Reverend Doctor thinks there are signs of improvement. Men are getting to be so interested in their salvation that they want to find some Pope forsooth to whom, as teacher, they may intrust their souls. Does the Most Reverend Doctor forget that a Protest three centuries ago went forth from the hearts of Christendom against the corruptions of this mortal teacher, and that an appeal was made from the Vicar of Christ to Christ himself? Has Christ grown insufficient, then, to the Christian that the latter should find occasion to transfer his allegiance back to the Man Who Tempted? Has the Infallible Hierarchy proved itself to be an organ of enlightenment, of political reform, or of human freedom? There are a set of Christians to whom these questions are still of great weight and interest.

CHUCK-A-LUCK.

The game of "Chuck-a-Luck," which we illustrate on page 445, is very common among the soldiers of Sherman's army. The game is played with dice. The board is divided into six sections, each of which is numbered in its order 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Two play: one representing the banker, and the other making the venture. The latter chooses one or two of the numbers and lays down ten cents on each, which are covered by the banker with an equal amount. If either or both of the two dice thrown give the number or numbers chosen, then the player wins and the banker loses, and vice versâ. Generally, in the long-run, the bankers get the best of it, though some of them break.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"POMPEY, why am my shoe like de corporation?"

"Guib it up, Sam. Why am it?"

"Kase it hab a hole in de sole, I tink!"

An old genius entered the saloon adjoining Forty Thieves, where booth 101 last drank of brandy just before he murdered Mr. Lincoln, and inquired of the bar-keeper "Have you the same bottle on hand out of which Booth drank on the night of the assassination?" "Yes, Sir." "And the same brandy in it?" "Yes, Sir." "Can I have a drink of that same brandy out of that same bottle?" "Yes, Sir." "Let's have it." The visitor tastes the brandy, makes a wry face, and continues: "And that's the same brandy that Booth drank?" "Yes, Sir," "Well, I don't envy Booth his bile!—he killed the President. A drink of that brandy would make a man kill his grandmother!"

LITERARY NOTE.—In what form did Burns address his departed Mary?—In a pyfyce (Polly goes), we presume.

An Irishman got out of the cars at a railway station for refreshments, but unfortunately the bell rung, and the train left before he had finished his repast. "Hould on!" cried Pat, as he ran like a madman after the car; "hould on, ye murtherin cold steam engine—ye've got a passenger aboard that's still aating!"

The frog who would a wooing go, having returned after his honey-moon, has been handsomely entertaining a select circle of friends, who have joined the happy couple in a nightly game of Croaky.

The first thing a man takes to in his life is his milk—the last is his beer.

Why is a pot like a fowl?—Because it contains a merry-thought.

LODGING-HOUSE LADY. "Do you like meat rare, Sir?" NEW LODGER. "No, madam, I like it three times a day."

At a Cattle Show in New Jersey, by order of the Judges, the pigs were awarded with a quantity of mire, and were all invited to a Competition Wallow.

A Portuguese shoemaker used to give his wife a severe flogging every week, just before he went to confession. On being asked the reason of this proceeding, he replied that, having a poor memory, he took this method of refreshing it, as his wife, while under the castigation, was sure to remind him of all his sins.

"Say, Sam, what you sell dem shoes for?"

"Cos I sell dem, Fungo."

"Why not?"

"Kase my's half soled already. Yah, yah!"

"One more question, Mr. Parks," said a counsel to a witness, who happened to be tailor. "You have known the defendant a long time; what are his habits—sober or otherwise?" "The one he's got on now I think is rather tight about the arms, and too short-waisted for the fashion," replied Parks. "Stand down," said the counsel.

There is but a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. A boy once thus described the effects of a hurricane: "It destroyed mountains, tore up oaks by the roots, dismounted churches, laid villages waste, and overturned a haystack."

A PRIVATE DOCTOR.—Why is a soldier who attends to the cannon in a battery like a secretive cavalry," like his own weapon?—Because he's always in.

A pew in a Congregational meeting-house in thus advertised for sale in Amherst, Massachusetts, Paper:—"A pew in the meeting-house of the first parish in Amherst for sale. The pew has that very desirable one in the right or a space just as long and wide as the pew is from the bottom of the meeting-house to the roof, and to enlarge as much higher as he can get. If a man will buy my pew and sit up in it on Sundays, and regard it as a good man, he will go to heaven, and my pew is as good a place to start from as any pew in the meeting-house."

A thick-headed squire, being worried by Sydney Smith in an argument, took his revenge by exclaiming. "If I had a son who was a fool, by Jove, I'd make him a parson." "Very probably," replied Sydney, "but I see that you have not such an unnatural mind."

SOMETHING LIKE RUBBER.—Amidst solemn stillness the clergyman's impressive words died away; the glittering diamond ring was rested on the bosom of the bride gently rose and fell; the robes of one or two of the bridesmaids fluttered like fairy gauze; the spectators and witnesses to the marriage marriages scarcely seemed to breathe; perspectors, with folded hands and downcast eyes, leant over their canes; still the bridle stood as motionless as if he had been a figure carved out of wood, and painted in blue, gold, and red; and the air came in gentle puffs from the open door.

THE DESPAIRING ONE.

FROM MURGER.

"SAY, who art thou that knock'st so late?"
"Open, ho, I."—"What may thy name?
I list not to unclose my gate
To all at night who entrance claim."

"Open."—"Thy name?"—"The bleak winds rave.
Open."—"Thy name?"—"For charity
Unclose thy doors, for in its grave
The corpse is not more cold than I;

"For I have wander'd all the day
From north to south, from east to west;
Oh, in thy cabin let me stay,
And in thy chimney-corner rest."

"Not yet; who art thou?"—"I am Fame;
I lead a mournful life."
"Pass on, vain phantom, empty name,"
"Oh, listen to me still, for I

"Am Love Eternal, endless Youth,
Most precious earthly store of gold—"
Wealth that can buy thee back thy bride."
"Can it awake the love that's cold?"

"Open to me, for I am Power,
The royal purple I give."
"Canst thou restore a single hour
Of those bright days I used to live?"

"Then, if thou will not ope thy gates
Till off thy guest's name thou art sure;
Open! The Death without who waits,
And brings for all thy ills the cure.

"List at my girdle, thou mayst hear
The many keys which hide and grate,
Of caverns whose recesses drear
Shall yield thee rest inviolate."

"Enter, oh, enter! welcome guest;
Enter; forgive these hands so bare.
At misery's hearth I bid thee rest,
And misery's squalid pallet share.

"Enter, for I an sick of life,
That task no more I ply in store;
Have long'd, yet fear'd, to end its strife,
And be at rest for evermore.

"Oh! enter now, eat, drink, and sleep,
And when thou hast all strife breaking day.
Sweet angel, let me near thee keep,
And bear me in thy arms away.

"For where thou goest I will go,
Will follow where thou dost in turn'd;
But leave my dog to live, for so
I shall not perish all unmourn'd."

Brandreth's Pills,

Whose Timely Use, under Providence, has often saved Life.

These celebrated Vegetable Pills are no new, untried remedy: they have been used and tested in the United States for thirty years, and are relied upon by hundreds of thousands of families as almost their sole medicine when sick. No care or expense is spared in their preparation, and the proprietor can prove that almost the whole of the King can have a medicine safer or surer than Brandreth's Pills.

They produce a good effect upon disease almost immediately they are taken. By some wonderful power, perhaps electric or nervous influence, the progress of diseased action is arrested; where watchfulness and pain have been present we have sweet repose quicker, and the patient soon obtains refreshing sleep.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. See upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

CONSTITUTION

LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

Many years almost incredible it that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks, and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel in the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as freshman as ever ever encountered by any reformers.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanence, and think that diseases can only be cured after "slow, regular medicinal process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-bal- anced scale, is ever in a state of equilibrium. But when, for any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and speedy remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) Diseases transmitted from Parent to Child.

PARALYSIS.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only known remedy for restoration of paralysis from forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Nerve Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, LOSS OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.

STRUMA, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, RHEUMATISM, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

These faint indefinitely and acquirred, filling life with untold misery, by the usual medicinal remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

[ARTHRITIS], LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, OR RHEUMFAUX.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a specific, it is in Rheumatism and in Kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—incessant sweatings are reduced. Cases, chronic in or weakness, of seventy or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the foul Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firm as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

and all other affections of the skin, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved so equal.

Both Fathers upon the female face, depending upon a deranged state of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will set the secretion, and remove the blotch, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Kidneys, leading to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an unbridled or cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or vile- or unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death in the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

THE COTTAGE PRINTING-PRESS

Is the best cheap printing-press ever introduced to public notice. Simple, durable, and efficient, occupying but little space, it is adapted to meet the wants of business men and others, who, for the sake of economy, necessity, or convenience, wish to do their own printing, and in their own premises. It enables them, without delay, and at a small expense, to print hand-bills, circulars, cards, bill-heads, &c., and in style equal to that of most country printing-offices. As though designed and will be found useful for all business and professional men, yet to country merchant and druggists it is an invaluable invention, furnishing not only the best but the cheapest method of advertising and increasing one's business. With each press we furnish, if desired, the necessary type, ink, &c., for the execution of any kind of printing.

No more acceptable present can be made to youth than one of these printing-offices. It combines lucrative employment with amusement and instruction. It teaches one to compose, to spell, and to punctuate. There is no better school for the young man than the printing-office, such a thing as an illiterate printer being unknown; and for the purpose of learning the trade, as an employment for life, the possession of one of our small printing-offices renders a regular apprenticeship unnecessary.

Printed instructions for setting type and managing the press accompany each office. When desired, the office will be arranged for printing in Spanish, French, German, and other European languages. Circular sent free. Specimen sheets of type, cuts, &c., 10 cents.

A BRITISH MIDSHIPMAN RESTORING THE AMERICAN EAGLE IN FRONT OF THE UNITED STATES LEGATION AT HONOLULU, SANDWICH ISLANDS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

A HYMN TO PEACE.

WHEN from the Ark went forth the dove
To mark the lingering flood's decrease,
She came again at evening time,
Bearing the olive-branch of peace.
Then knew the patriarch of old
That the remains of the branch she bore
And from the earth the waters passed
To drown the hills and vales no more.

For God, who sends the gentle rains,
Has with his covenant an bich,
His radiant bow of promise gilds
The clouds that veil the azure sky;
So Noah of old in ages gone
The sacred covenant was given;
And God upon his throne has set
The sign of peace 'mid Earth and Heaven.

For four long years the Lord has veiled
His face behind the battle-cloud,
From hill to hill across the land
Has pealed the battle-anthem loud.
Our fields have drunk the precious blood
That free as water has been shed,
The streams that lave the battle-plains
With blood of heroes have run red.

But now at last, in distance drowned,
The cannon's thunders full and cease,
And borne upon the summer wind
We hear the sweet-toned bells of peace.
The sulphurous cloud of battle lifts,
From off his face of God withdrawn,
And in the East our eyes behold
The broad light of a purer Dawn.

And Peace, her olive-tree beneath,
Where late was heard War's echoing drum,
With folded hands and kindly eyes,
Sits dreaming of the years to come—
Or in her sunny vineyard stands
And tends with care the fruitful vine
Or crushes from the swollen grape
In plenteous streams the purple wine.

Ring, jubilant bells! the night has flown
That brought this weight of grief and tears,
The morning light within the East
Given promise of the thousand years.
Ring, jubilant bells, from far and near,
Ring out, nor let your music cease
Till all the listening world proclaim
The coming of the Prince of Peace!

PUBLIC SAFETY AND THE CONSTITUTION.

THE New York Times thinks our statement of its position upon the question of reorganization disingenuous. We are sorry it should have seemed so, since there can be no greater folly than for the loyal friends of the Union and Government to misrepresent each other in the discussion of the proper policy of reorganization. If the Times had remembered this truth it would have been more accurate in its reports of the Boston meeting, and more candid in its comments upon it. To speak, as it did, of a large assembly of highly intelligent American citizens, which discussed great measures of public policy with singular ability and in the most generous temper, and which spoke of the President with the utmost respect, sympathy, and confidence, as a meeting for "threatening.....with loose rhetoric," as seeking "to govern the country by menaces;" and to denounce the meeting as "a faction," and its suggestions as "sectionalism," was certainly not very ingenuous, but was probably very agreeable to the gentleman concerned whose patriotism is not less consistent and unselfish than that of the New York Times.

In commenting upon MR. DANA'S speech the Times said that it did not agree with him that "we may rightfully impose upon the Southern States any requirements which we may deem essential to public safety." We cannot believe that this was but another way of saying that we must submit to the action of those States, even if we considered it destructive of the public safety. The Times replies that we misrepresent its meaning, and then adds: "The Government has not the right to make its ideas of the public safety the sole and exclusive guide of its action in dealing with the Southern States. It is bound in this as in every thing else by the Constitution of the United States." Undoubtedly it is. But the question is, whether, in the process of reorganization, any measure which is essential to the public safety can be considered unconstitutional? Certainly it can, says the Times. Then it is unconstitutional to do some things which are essential to the public safety. In other words, the Constitution does not in every emergency provide for the public safety. And here we differ from the Times. We think that it does.

The Times asks us to point out the section and clause of the Constitution which give the Government any authority "to impose conditions and restrictions upon the Southern States, even if we do believe the public safety requires it." Will the Times, in turn, point out the section and clause of the Constitution which empower the National Government to set aside a State Government in which open rebellion has ceased—to depose officers legally elected and unconvicted of crime—to appoint a provisional government for a State—to summon a convention to amend the State Constitution and introduce arbitrary tests for the electors—and to maintain a force of United States troops within the limits of a State where there are neither active rebellion nor invasion, and which has not asked for national assistance?

The Times says that "suffrage in the rebel States may and must be restricted [by the National Government], because men who have been rebels can not be loyal voters until they have been restored to their rights by executive pardon." Will the Times point out the section and clause of the Constitution which empower the President to deprive of all political rights persons untried and unconvicted of treason or of any crime whatever?

Yet all these are for which it can find no verbal constitutional authority, the Times defends, and justly. We also defend them. MR. DANA and the Boston meeting defend them. All truly loyal Union men defend them. And for what reason? Because the Constitution can not be interpreted as hostile to itself. Because, although it does not provide specifically for this emergency, it has provided generally for all emergencies; and because whatever is essential to secure the objects for which it was formed is authorized by it by necessary implication. In the reorganization of States still panting and feverish with rebellion the necessity of the case, the public faith, and the public safety, require the initiatory measures which the President has taken, and which the Constitution justifies. And "whatever public expediency or exigency" is essential to the end sought by the President and the country will be justified by the same authority.

Even the Times does not deny it. The most generous of opponents, it furnishes its adversaries—let us rather say, its friends—with weapons. If it be too eager to find the constitutional, it is too intelligent not to know that the Constitution can not be made to imperil the public safety. One day it stigmatizes those who say that it may be necessary to enfranchise the colored citizens of the Southern States as factious and menacing. A few days afterward it says: "We will go further, and say that it is possible to imagine a state of disloyal feeling in the South which would make it expedient to confer the suffrage upon all the loyal freedmen even at the hazard of great evil. Better this risk than a reign of treason in disguise, or than an indefinitely protracted military rule." The Times, in these words, merely repeats the Boston meeting, and repeats the conclusions to which all thoughtful Union men inevitably come. Thus the Philadelphia Press—a shrewd journal —which says that the Government has not the right to insist upon negro suffrage, adds: "But if generosity and magnanimity are to be repaid only by new evidences of treachery and treason a remedy even for such baseness can be applied."

In other words, if the public safety demands the enfranchisement of the whole loyal population of the rebel States it will be enfranchised, or the States will continue unorganized until the voters already recognized choose to do what is necessary. If this be revolution, such revolution, and menacing, words have lost their meaning.

THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS publishes the letter of a friend who fears that the late rebel States will appear by their representatives and Senators at the meeting of December, demanding seats, and that they can not be excluded, because the Government will declare that they may now resume their relations with the Government, which have been merely suspended. But MR. PHILLIPS's correspondent has not carefully read the President's proclamation. There is nothing final in his action. The whole subject is referred to Congress. The Governors whom the President appoints are to call conventions. The conventions are to amend the State Constitutions. Voters in the State are authorized by the President are then to act upon the Constitution. And then it is submitted to Congress; and when Congress has decided it to be "such a republican form of State Government as entitles the State to the guarantee of the United States" it will admit, and not before, it becomes the fundamental law of the State; and then, and not before, the Senators and Representatives elected in pursuance of it will be eligible to seats in Congress; and before they can take their seats they must take the oath of July 1, 1862, which excludes every body who aided or encouraged the rebellion in any manner whatever.

As MR. HENRY WINTER DAVIS very truly said at Chicago: "There is nothing in President JOHNSON'S proclamation which assumes to conclude the judgment of the Congress of the United States or the action of the State Governments in the rebel States." The President holds that the States have not ceased to exist; but he holds not less firmly that they can not resume their relations to the national Government except upon conditions acceptable to that Government. MR. JOHNSON was a Senator in Congress when the rebellion broke. He stood in his place and declared that, were he President, he would hang as traitors men who should do certain acts. And because those men have done them—because with fire and sword they have made war upon the Government, and because, after dealing the most deadly and cruel blows upon the country, they were ignominiously and utterly baffled, it is probable that, being now President, MR. JOHNSON will hasten to open the doors of Congress, and to bow masked traitors in? As a sagacious politician, is he likely to look for support to the caste which has always hated him, or to the people who elected him, and who will hang have conquered the caste? In the settlement of the questions raised by the war, is he likely to ally himself with those of the North who have steadily and unscrupulously opposed him in the struggle for every step? Is there any thing in the condition of public affairs which should induce him to desert his friends and trust to his enemies?

If any man in the country has shown himself earnest in prosecuting the war, and in the purpose of overthrowing the faction and the spirit which accomplished the war, it is ANDREW JOHNSON. If any man honestly respects the will of the people, as expressed through their lawful representatives in Congress, it is the President. He therefore said plainly in his speech to the South Carolina delegation that he intended "to exert the power and influence of the Government to place in power the popular heart of the nation." And that there might be no doubts that he believed the final decision of the question of reorganization rested with Congress he said to the delegation that, "as the Executive, he could only take the initiatory steps to enable them to do the things which it was incumbent upon them to perform." The President initiates and Congress completes the national reorganization. That is the principle of President JOHNSON, and all loyal Union men will certainly heartily agree with him. They may differ as to what the initial steps should be, but they hold with the President that they are not conclusive.

RAILROADS IN PEACE-TIME.

THERE are times of surprises. When LEE surrendered Wall Street was full of pity for the condition of the Northern railroads, which had grown prosperous during the war, but which, it was universally supposed, were to be replunged by peace into the old non-dividend-paying condition. From 1859 to 1864 the business of the roads had more than doubled. This, every body said, was the fruit of the war—the transportation of soldiers, military supplies, etc., etc. We all saw that when peace came again, and there were no more troops to be moved, and no more guns and food to be carried to Washington for Government, traffic on the railroads would decline to the old figures, and railroad dividends would again resemble virgin's visits.

LEE surrendered on 9th April, and within a fortnight from that date the disbandment of the troops and the retrenchment of the navy began. By the end of May a large reduction in the army and in the movement of military supplies had been effected. The traffic returns for next June show an average increase over last year of 30 or 40 per cent. Instead of falling back to the old figures which were current before the war, railroad traffic is far in excess of those of the most active period of the war—of the period when Government was moving men and material with almost equal activity, and when grain was at so high a price that it could afford to pay almost any freight that railway managers asked.

This is an astounding fact—one for which, we venture to say, not one among the best-informed railroad men or Wall Street financiers was prepared. It is a startling profession and the street alike by surprise. Allowing for every special reason which can be assigned—for the return of disbanded troops, for Western farm, for a large amount of pleasure travel, and all such influences—the June traffic on our leading lines of railway must remain an utterly incomprehensible mystery to those who still believe, as every body once believed, that the great receipts of 1863 and 1864 were the fruit of the war, and that when the cause ceased to operate the effect would cease.

We are forced, in spite of preconceived theories, to seek, outside of the direct effect of the war, for the cause of the development of internal trade which commenced in 1861, and which seems to be going on still, after the peace, with unabated vigor. And the closer the subject is analyzed the clearer will it appear that this traffic—if it be maintained—must be ascribed to the effect of MR. CHASE'S paper-money issues, which, by supplying capital in abundance, facilitated the development of resources previously dormant, and called into productive activity the energies of every section of the country. Bad as the effects of the issues of the legal-tenders were in one respect, and severe as must be the crisis preceding their redemption in coin, they rendered at least this service—they furnished the country with what it needed most—capital; may this account for the increase of 100 per cent. in our internal trade in four years? There is one fact which tends strongly to confirm this view. The great railroad war of 1855 between the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania, and the Baltimore and Ohio, was waged for through freight. There was not freight enough going to and coming from the West to keep all the four trunk lines busy; competition arose, rates were cut down, and at least two of the roads were nearly bankrupted in the fight. Now, not one of these four lines is anxious about through freight. The New York roads profess—we believe truly—to make no profit on it. Both the Erie and the Central are being sued by scores of people who claim damages because the roads would not or could not, or at least did not, carry their through freight in due time. The fact was and is that both lines have no moral local business—which has almost wholly sprung up since 1861—that they have but little rolling stock disengaged for through traffic. The Erie —which once ran through a wilderness—can now live and pay dividends without carrying a pound of through freight or a single Chicago passenger.

If it be admitted that the largely increased railway traffic of 1863, '64, and '65 was the fruit of increased development of resources and increased production, it will follow that no material decline in that traffic need be apprehended under ordinary circumstances, and the corollary, that no railway dividends and the value of railroad property are concerned, is too obvious to need explanation. Still, two or three conditions must be fulfilled before our railroads can command, on the average, a price duly proportioned to their productiveness.

In the first place, there must be some clear general principle established as the subject of new construction. The country and our internal traffic grow so fast that each year every road requires new tracks, rolling stock, and other facilities to do the business that is forced upon it. For instance, the Erie was built to do a business of $5,000,000 as a maximum; it will earn this year over $15,000,000. The Reading was expected to earn in good years $1,000,000; last year it earned over $8,000,000. The Fort Wayne was calculated to earn $4,000,000; it will earn $8,000,000 this year. Now it is perfectly clear that the track and machinery required to earn $15,000,000 must prove inadequate to earn three times that amount. New track must be laid, bridges strengthened, new locomotives, cars, depôts, elevators, etc., procured. Where is the money to come from for construction to be had? If it is to come out of earnings, stockholders will never receive any dividends while property—which would be laid to railway investments. Yet when a railroad, earning a fair dividend on its cost, undertakes to pay it, while simultaneously offering stock or bonds in market for sale to pay dividends, imperatively required by the development of business, the cry is immediately raised that the company is compelled to pay dividends, its credit is fatally stabbed, and its securities decline in Wall Street. This was witnessed in the case of the Chicago and Northwestern, which last spring borrowed money to equip its road, and tried to raise it by selling mortgage-bonds, while at the same time it paid on its stock dividends which were fairly earned: the cry of roguery was raised, and the Company could not sell its bonds at 72½ per cent.

It is high time that the general principle should be adopted by all leading roads, and understood by the public, that new construction can not come out of earnings, but must be represented by new bonds or stock; and that so long as the new bonds or stock represent actual property judiciously acquired, and at a fair cost, they rather enhance than diminish the value of the original investment. It must be understood that our roads, at best, are only half built. They only cost on the average, $40,000 a mile, while the Belgian roads, with a country half their vastly cheaper, cost $170,000 a mile, and the French roads $101,000 a mile. A road like the Erie, which, with the leased lines, stands in its present owners about $30,000,000, would be represented, if an English line, by over $100,000,000 of securities of various kinds. So long as the public will not understand capitalization and traffic the country-action-account of no leading line can ever be closed. It will need every year new money in increasing its facilities for the transaction of business, and this money will have to be raised by an increase either of capital or of funded debt. But such increase ought always to be based upon and on the capital of the previous year, if they have been fairly earned. Nor should such dividends, if fairly earned, be the managers' excuse for issues of dishonest administration, though declared simultaneously with the sale for cash of new stock or bonds.

Another and not less important prerequisite to the establishment of railroad credit on a sound basis is a higher standard of mercantile honor among railroad directors. At present many leading railway directors are among the most active speculators in their own stocks—"bulling" and "bearing" them alternately, and using their influence as directors to insure the success of their private speculations. This is all wrong. A railway director is a trustee of the property over which he is set, and has no more right to make money out of dealings in that property than a guardian to make money by speculating in the property of his ward. In Ohio purchases and sales of stock by a director or in the railroad he directs are absolutely void.

A suit has lately been commenced in one of our courts against a leading railway director, in which the plaintiff claims heavy damages by reason, as he alleges, of the depreciation of the value of his property by the "bear" speculations of the defendant. We can not tell how this case may result. But we venture to predict that the first railway stockholder who can establish in court that the market-price of his stock was altered by the speculations of a director of the road will obtain exemplary damages from a jury. It is, in a sound, sensible, friendly Englishman. The excitement of the canvass has already begun. We observe a riot at a great meeting at Nottingham, which could be suppressed only by the military. Do our British critics wish us to find in that event, as they do in every similar incident here, a proof of the absurd character of the institutions of the country?

THE INEFFICACY OF BLARNEY.

FIRMNESS is entirely consistent with conciliation. It is very desirable that there should be no wanton provocation of any kind any where. It would be truly delightful that all men should dwell together in unity. We should gladly record, and our friends and co-laborers, the artists of this paper, would illustrate with their utmost skill, the blessing for which the poor lambs were living upon the most amicable terms, and that "our misguided brethren" at the South were link in gentle fraternity with us in the hour of secession and the wickedness of rebellion against an equal government of laws, made by the common consent.

But the fact is that they are not penitent. The truth is that they are conquered only, not converted. We defy any constant and faithful reader of the various journals which take into lusurrectionary States to declare himself to be convinced that the mass of their population have changed their views of the character of the United States Government. They believed in State Sovereignty. They have tried to assert it by arms and have failed. Do they renounce their faith? They maintained slavery. They defended it on every ground. Slavery has been abolished. Do they believe it to be wrong? South Carolina shook her fist at the Union more than thirty years ago. Congress comprehended the difficulty. Has South Carolina ever been loyal since that time? She has now endeavored to achieve what she then threatened. The failure is palpable. Is the feeling changed?

It is idle to assume that the exasperation, the studied traditional hatred of the people for the slave interest toward the Union, which has been sedulously fostered for thirty years, has sudden ly disappeared because the Union has proved itself to be the stronger. The feeling is not gone, and is not as strong and firm as the sword that subdues, the vanquished win the victory. And it should be clearly understood that overcome by history is not reconmation. If, for instance, we refer, as we did recently, to the views of MR. BOYCE, of South Carolina, five years ago, we do it not from any feeling that MR. BOYCE, but from the most enduring hostility to the spirit in which he was educated, and from a profound conviction that personal power is the very guardinly confided to such hands. Believing that the spirit of which he was an illustration—the spirit of CALHOUN, of JEFFERSON DAVIS, of FOOTE, WISE, and BARNWELL RHETT, and MASON—is hatred to the genius of equal rights and fatal to American institutions, we shall hold it to be a sacred duty to expose it by ways and as plainly as we can. It blinded our fathers, and it will try to blind their children. It betrayed us four years ago, and it will betray us again whenever it can. It is only about eighty-five years of peace and four years of war have taught us is impeachable, and the Americans people now know it very well indeed.

We trust, therefore, that, while we are all grateful for "the crowning mercy" of the defeat of this spirit in the field, we shall be only the more resolved that it shall be equally defeated at the polls and in Congress. But this result will not be accomplished by mere exultation. It is not very sagacious to shout, "They're whipped, and they know it. They'll give no more trouble. We remember that, on the 4th of July, 1864, Governor Andrew proclaimed to Secretary STANTON, "Lieutenant-General GRANT will not be troubled with any further reinforcements to LEE from BEAUREGARD'S army." That was a mistaken and dangerous conviction. Yet at that very moment BEAUREGARD was marching by his flank, and did reinforce LEE. So what are those who believe that the late rebels entirely accept the situation, and are only anxious to be reconciled to the Government and ours and make friends, let us send out a scouting party or two to discover whether they may not be marching by our flank.

It is very desirable that business should revive; that the Southern crops should be brought to market; that immigration should flow into the Southern States; that correspondence and friendly communication should be established. But it is much more desirable and important that these things should be soundly and safely done than that they should be done hastily. Industrial prosperity we have had before, and it did not save us. If we rebuild that prosperity hurriedly and unwisely it will topple down again in the same ruin. It is unnecessary, as it is wrong, uselessly to call hard names. But we must let our yea be yea, and our NAY, NAY. This country has suffered enough from cowardice calling itself conciliation, and servility claiming to be conservatism. Henceforth it can step safely only if it stands straight. Our future is bright and sure if we choose to make it so. And to do that we need only temperate minds, firm hearts, determined will, and faithful words. If we try to step on the blarney-stone we shall certainly slip up.

A CONFUSED GOVERNOR.

HON. JAMES JOHNSON, Provisional Governor of the United States for the State of Georgia, has recently made a speech at Savannah. The Governor says that he has been appointed simply to enable the Georgians to form a government. It is very fortunate that he is to do no more, as he has evidently a very confused conception of the situation.

Thus the Governor says that "the people of the Confederate States find themselves without government." Will the Governor explain what are "the Confederate States," and who are their people?

He adds that "War has existed between the United States and the South." Will the Governor inform us where "the South" is situated, and how it thus describes as a power foreign to his country?

GOVERNOR JOHNSON also says: "The slaves, upon the surrender of their masters, were captured legally, if not actually." MR. JOHNSON is a citizen of the United States. His authority as Governor is derived from the United States. It is supported by the army of the United States. When, therefore, he speaks of the surrender of "our armies, what does he mean? Does he, in a manner, claim the receipt of the greatest rebel forces "our armies?" If so, what does GOVERNOR JOHNSON call the armies of the United States?

GARDNER'S PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE present perfection of the art of photography enables an illustrated paper like ours to depict persons and events with the utmost precision. During the war, now happily ended, we have been in the receipt of the greatest variety of views and portraits from all the armies and from every part of the country, so that we have been enabled to present to our readers sketches of our artists to construct a truly exact and living history of the time. Among our photographic friends and allies none have been more consistently serviceable than MR. ALEXANDER GARDNER, of Washington. It is to his skill that we owe the interesting and accurate views which we have given of the ceremonies at Gettysburg on the Fourth of July, when the corner-stone of the monument was laid in memory of the fallen brave. The orator of the occasion, General HOWARD, whose portrait, from a photograph by MR. GARDNER, is included in the illustrations, is one of the historic heroes of the war. He commanded at the battle of Gettysburg, where he lost an arm, he was subsequently distinguished as a corps commander in the great march of SHERMAN, and is now Chief of the Freedmen's Bureau. THE HARVEST OF DEATH—GETTYSBURG, JULY 4, 1863.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON.]

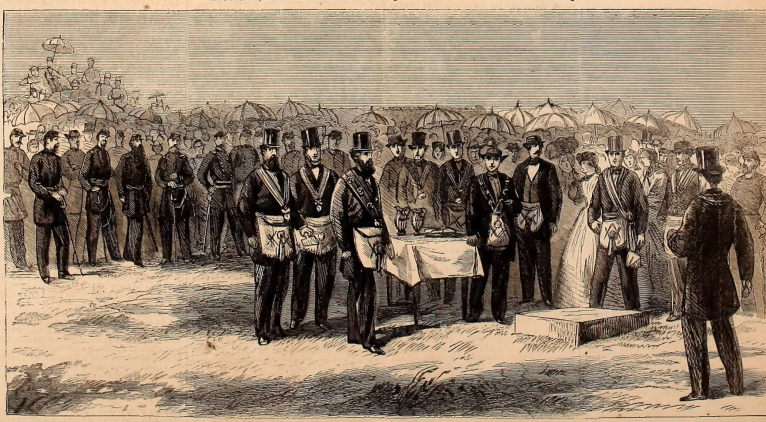
THE GETTYSBURG MONUMENT.

CONSECRATED JULY 4, 1865.

In our last Number we gave an illustration of the Soldiers' National Cemetery at Gettysburg, and printed Colonel HALPINE'S eloquent poem. This week we give further illustrations of the Battle and of the late Celebration.

The battle of Gettysburg, fought on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of July, 1863, was a critical battle, and was the first very decisive contest of the war. The victory gained by General MEADE stood not alone, but was paralleled by a simultaneous success at Vicksburg—just as important and just as decisive. Notwithstanding the whining appeal, periodically emanating from the rebel executive, that the war undertaken by the Southern revolution was for self-defense and to maintain the right of self-government, it is a historic fact that it was from the first aggressive, and only ceased to be such when the forces of the rebels had been so thoroughly exhausted as to make them powerless for offense. After the unprovoked assault upon Sumter the excited emotions of the rebels found a single voice. "Washington must be assailed and captured!" The fate of Washington, it was reiterated, must be the fate of Carthage. She must be destroyed. But for President LINCOLN'S promptness, and the generous patriotism of the people, this catastrophe would have fallen upon us early in 1861. The next year a formidable blow aimed at Richmond for a few months absorbed the attention of the rebel government. But when M'CLELLAN'S grand expedition, at first so confident and apparently so strong, failed of its object, suffering a most memorable defeat, then the design of the Richmond authorities against the national capital was again renewed. The battles of Antietam and South Mountain again saved us. In the year 1863 General LEE, who had now assumed the command of the rebel army in the place of JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON, projected a new and still more formidable invasion and with the same object. The fate of this gigantic project was decided by the battle of Gettysburg.



In the first place, General LEE failed to carry out the strategic conception of his campaign. He had intended by manœuvres east of the Blue Ridge to lead General HOOKER to uncover the approaches to Washington.—General HOOKER, on the other hand, fell back in such a manner as to cover those approaches. This deprived the rebel commander of the advantages which he had hoped to gain from his excellent force of cavalry under General STUART. A new element also appeared to frustrate LEE'S original design. This was PLEASANTON'S cavalry, which, under a vigorous leader, so crippled STUART'S force as to prevent the latter from performing the part which had been assigned to it. It is not improbable that, his first plan being foiled, General LEE would have withdrawn but for the urgent pressure of the rebel government urging him to push his army boldly northward into Maryland and Pennsylvania. The theory in this new plan was to draw the United States army to a distance from the capital, and seizing the first favorable moment, to defeat HOOKER and pursue his shattered army into Washington.—This was a repetition of the campaign of 1862, and might have been successful if the United States army had conducted itself in a manner suitable to General LEE'S designs. But it refused to be outmanœuvred; and thus it happened that, after consuming much valuable time, LEE was at last compelled to give up manœuvre and rest his chances for success upon the result of a hard-fought battle, in which his army would measure its strength with that of the United States.

The rebel army broke camp at Fredericksburg on the 30 of June, and on the 24th crossed the Potomac—not east of the Blue Ridge as was intended, but at Shepherdstown and Williamsport, encamping three days afterward at Chambersburg. This army was estimated at over one hundred thousand of all arms.

At this point LEE was painfully embarrassed by the absence of STUART'S cavalry, which PLEASANTON'S prompt and vigorous operations had put out of the field. The movement of LEE'S entire army up the valley could no longer be regarded as a manœuvre—as the previous movement of EWELL's force to Chambersburg had been justly regarded—and HOOKER immediately marched his army north of the Potomac. The whole country was aroused, and outfits from half a dozen States was moving rapidly to the scene of action.

MAJOR-GENERAL OLIVER O. HOWARD.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GARDNER, WASHINGTON.]

On the 28th of June HOOKER's army lay between Harper's Ferry and Frederick; LEE's was partly at Chambersburg, with an advanced column moving on Gettysburg. At this crisis General HOOKER was relieved by General MEADE. A battle was now imminent. On the night of the 30th LEE's advance occupied the mountains east of Gettysburg. Within twenty-four hours the greater portion of that army was gathered together in the vicinity of Gettysburg, confronted by only two corps of the United States army.

On the 1st of July the conflict opened. REYNOLDS, who had been ordered by MEADE to occupy Gettysburg, had drawn up his men under cover of Seminary Ridge, and immediately attacked the enemy, sending, at the same time, for reinforcements. Scarcely had the action begun before he fell, mortally wounded. Soon General HOWARD arrived on the field with part of the Eleventh Corps, and assumed the command. Notwithstanding the disparity of the forces engaged HOWARD repulsed with success the assaults of the rebels; but in the afternoon, his right flank being turned by the superior numbers of the enemy, he withdrew through the town to Cemetery Hill, on the other side—the southern—there he was joined by HANCOCK, who took the command, and easily repulsed an assault on his right flank toward evening. That night SICKLES, with the Twelfth Corps, and SLOCUM, with a part of the Third, arrived on the field; and before the dawn of the 2d General MEADE himself had reached the front, and the rest of the army was expeditiously brought up. The whole of MEADE's army was now disposed in the Cemetery Hill grounds in a curve, stretching along the ridges which run southeast and southwest, encircling the town by its form of a crescent. LEE's army occupied opposite ridges, about a mile and a half distant, and overlapping either flank of MEADE. It was not until Saturday came up with the Sixth Corps, a little after noon, that MEADE's army reached an equality in point of numbers with that of his antagonist; but his position was one of great strength. The Second and Fifth Corps had come up in the morning.

In the middle of the afternoon on the 2d the action was reopened. Under cover of a furious cannonade the rebel forces were massed and hurled against Sickles's corps on the left, which was thrust back by the shock, but was promptly supported by the Second and Fifth, and the enemy were driven back in confusion after a struggle which lasted till sunset. As late as eight o'clock in the evening the enemy attempted to drive the Eleventh Corps from its lodgment on Cemetery Hill, but was repulsed with severe loss. The only advantage gained by the enemy during the day was the success of General EWELL in obtaining a foothold within our lines on the right when MEADE had depleted his force to resist the attack against his left.

On the morning of the 3d EWELL was driven back by General GRANT. Then there w. a lull until half past one o'clock, when a cannonade was opened, heavier than on the day before, and LEE again hurled his columns against the left and centre. The cannonade lasted two hours before the assault was made. The most of the rebel force was gallant and desperate, and was principally directed against the Second Corps. The shock was received without a waver, though General HANCOCK and GIBBON were both wounded, and at length the enemy was routed and utterly defeated.

In this battle LEE lost fully one-third of his whole army. On the morning of the 4th it commenced rapidly to retreat, leaving nearly eight thousand wounded to the care of MEADE's army. MEADE's loss in round numbers was 23,000.

On the 19th of November, a little more than four months after the battle, the National Cemetery for the burial of those who fell in the fight was dedicated. On that occasion an elaborate and eloquent oration was pronounced by the Honorable EDWARD EVERETT, who has since gone to his rest, and whose name will be forever associated with this memorial.

On the 4th of July, 1865, just two years after the battle, and when the war for the Union had been triumphantly concluded, the corner-stone of the Soldiers' Monument was laid in the Cemetery with imposing ceremonies. There were present General MEADE, HOWARD, MOTT, SICKEL, DODSWELL, CRAWFORD, GIBBON, and ROBINSON, who participated in the memorable conflict on this field. General HOWARD delivered an impressive oration, the theme of which was the trials and sacrifices of the private soldier. In the course of his address he paid a touching memorial to his "friend and trusted commander, General REYNOLDS." He alluded also to the connection of EVERETT and LINCOLN with the previous occasion. "These great men," said he, "have been already consecrated, and are doubly sacred from the memory of our brethren who lie here, and from the association with them upon earth. Side by side, Mr. EVERETT and Mr. LINCOLN, who gave tone to the exercises of consecration two years ago, whose own bodies are now resting beneath us here, but whose spirit is still living and unmistakably animating every true American heart this day. We have now been called to lay the corner-stone of a monument. This monument is not a mere family record—not even a simple memorial of individual fame, nor the silent tribute to genius. It is raised to the soldier. It is a memorial of his life and his noble death. It embraces a patriotic brotherhood of heroes in its inscriptions, and is an unceasing herald of labor, suffering, union, liberty, and sacrifice."

After the battle of Gettysburg and the capture of Vicksburg the exhaustion of the vital forces of the rebellion went on with great rapidity. The Fourth of July, 1863, may fairly be considered the turning-point of the war. And for generations to come, as the national anniversary returns, the battle-field of Gettysburg and its monuments will be newly consecrated by our people.

AN ENGLISH LORD DOING PENANCE.

A SCION of nobility does not always behave with dignity. Of this we recently had an example in the conduct of Lord CHARLES BERESFORD at Honolulu. This model nobleman was a midshipman on board Her Britannic Majesty's ship Clio, which arrived at Honolulu on the 13th of April. The Clio came for the purpose of conveying Queen EMMA and suite to Panama on the route for Europe. Lord BERESFORD had conspired with others among the ship's company; and as the vessel was lying in port numerous petty expeditions were carried out against private citizens. Boats and their gear and sails were removed, and other depredations committed. But his lordship was not satisfied to leave off his escapade never before his self-respecting and gentlemen of British audacity in the way of national insolence. So one night, with his associates, he came into the city and shot the American eagle which decorated the entrance to the American Minister's dwelling. The next day, after an extensive search, the eagle was found on board the Clio.

The captain of the vessel, Mr. TOCKINGTON, more gentlemanly than his lordship, recommended that restitution should be made in a manner somewhat humiliating to the young nobleman, who was compelled to leave the ship's boat in full dress and nail it upon the gateway from which he had removed it. The illustration on our first page represents the humiliating scene. Mr. PAYNE, who, in addition to the restitution, was also compelled to apologize for his conduct. On the left hand the American gentleman is seen in close conversation with the Captain, his face fronting the reader.

But there was a perfunctoriness about the young lord's penitence that is very characteristic. The Clio sailed May 6. The night before she left another insult was offered to the British Minister, Mr. PAYNE. A band of sailors and officers went through the streets singing "The Bonnie Blue Flag" and "John Brown" with a chorus somewhat different from the original. A part of the mob stopped in front of the Legation and used language too disgusting to be quoted. Mr. PAYNE, the British Minister was absent, and thus escaped the insult which had been prepared for him. There is something, we think, in Lord BERESFORD's conduct and sentence which is very characteristic of the aristocracy which he represents.

THE END OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

ON Wednesday, July 5, sentence was passed upon the conspirators who were tried by a military court, by President LINCOLN, and the same day was approved by President JOHNSON. According to the terms of this sentence HAROLD, ATZEROTT, PAYNE, and Mrs. SURRATT were condemned to be hung; O'LAUGHLIN, ARNOLD, and Dr. MUDD to be imprisoned for life; and SPANGLER for six years. Mr. SURRATT was condemned to be hung; but, the court not having unanimously concurred in this sentence which is very characteristic of the aristocracy which he represents.

THE END OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

ON Wednesday, July 5, sentence was passed upon the conspirators who were tried by a military court, by President LINCOLN, and the same day was approved by President JOHNSON. According to the terms of this sentence HAROLD, ATZEROTT, PAYNE, and Mrs. SURRATT were condemned to be hung; O'LAUGHLIN, ARNOLD, and Dr. MUDD to be imprisoned for life; and SPANGLER for six years. Mr. SURRATT was condemned to be hung; but, the court not having unanimously concurred in this sentence which is very characteristic of the aristocracy which he represents.

The executions of the sentence was one of the most necessary of the day. The sentence was made known to the prisoners on Thursday, the 6th, and the very next day, at half past one o'clock, the cause sentenced to be hung were launched into eternity.

It was about noon on Thursday that General HARTRANFT went to the prisoners' cells, carrying, in General HANCOCK's presence. PAYNE, whose real name is LEWIS THORNTON POWELL, received the intelligence of his fate with indifference, silently expecting nothing else. He requested the spiritual advice of Dr. STRACKER, a Baptist clergyman of Baltimore, which was granted. ATZEROTT, on the other hand, and HAROLD, and Mrs. SURRATT, were surprised at their sentence. ATZEROTT, in particular, was disconsolate and terrified. HAROLD was calmer than he had shown himself on previous occasions.

As soon as the findings of the court were made public the friends of those sentenced to death began their importunities to obtain a commutation. In the case of Mrs. SURRATT much sympathy was excited, not in behalf of the criminal herself, but of her unfortunate daughter, who made the most persistent and heart-rending pleas for her condemned mother. Similar efforts were made by HAROLD's sisters to obtain a pardon for their brother.

Mrs. SURRATT asked for a postponement of her sentence for four days, on the ground that such delay was needful to enable her to receive from a Roman Catholic Church for penitential exercises. But this privilege was refused. Not content with petitioning in her own application, Mrs. SURRATT's friends had recourse to the writ of habeas corpus, which was obtained from Judge FISHER, of the District. This had no effect. To have admitted the force of the writ would have been an admission of the illegality of the military court.

By night, on Thursday, the scaffold had been erected in the south yard of the old Penitentiary building, in the rear of the present Capitol prison. That night was a wretched one for the condemned prisoners. Until nearly midnight they were attended by their friends, and the hearts of Mrs. SURRATT remained with her mother almost the entire night. PAYNE bore up with firmness, though in the morning he confessed to Father WIGET. SURRATT suffered much from mental and physical prostration. HAROLD, comforted by the presence of his sisters—and in another—got some rest. ATZEROTT was wholly unnerved, and having passed a sleepless night, he was found in a fainting state.

At noon, on Friday, PAYNE and his three associates who were to suffer death had their last interview with their friends. PAYNE had no relatives, but was visited by a female friend, who, it is said, is a sister. The interview lasted about half an hour, when the lady visitors, dressed in deep mourning, issued from the inner door.

At one o'clock the heavy door leading from the prison to the court-yard was opened, and the procession to the scaffold commenced. First came Mrs. SURRATT, supported by two gentlemen and followed by her two spiritual advisers, one of whom carried a small cross and a book of prayer. The limbs of the victim seemed to fail her, and it was with great difficulty that she was assisted to the scaffold. She ascended the steps, her hands manacled behind her, and her face wearing a ghastly expression. ATZEROTT followed, his hands and feet both shackled, and his knees quaking with fear. PAYNE came PAYNE, manacled in the same manner, and dressed in the navy pants and collarless shirt which he had worn during the trial. He alone was fearless, remorseless, and unembarrassed. Last of the four, HAROLD mounted the scaffold and took his seat between ATZEROTT and PAYNE—Mrs. SURRATT sitting on the other side of the latter.

When they were all seated Mr. GILBERT and Dr. GOTT stepped forward, and in each separately expressed the thanks of PAYNE and HAROLD for the kindness shown them by General HARTRANFT during their confinement, and offered prayers for the prisoners. Mr. BUTLER performed a similar office for ATZEROTT.

The prisoners were then led to the ropes prepared for them; then their arms and legs were bound, and the noose passed over the head of each, no request being offered by any. But ATZEROTT still quaked with a fear which was terrible to witness. Then the cap was drawn over the face of each, and one the trap was sprung and the four bodies swung in the air. With Mrs. SURRATT there was no struggle, as there was with the others. PAYNE lived six minutes and a half.

There were about three thousand soldiers on guard, posted at the different entrances to the prison-yard, and about the avenues of approach. General HANCOCK had issued about two hundred tickets admitting spectators to witness the execution. The court-yard was cleared, and the bodies were taken down and buried in the coffins prepared for them.

Since the execution of ATZEROTT is reported as having been prepared by one who had known the prisoner since his arrest. According to this statement he was born in Prussia in the year 1835, and came to this country with his parents in 1854. He soon engaged for some time in the cracker-making business. Last fall he was engaged in his business at Port Tobacco when he was induced to join the conspiracy for abducting the President. The first attempt to carry out this plot was to be on the Seventh Street road, about the middle of March, when the President was expected to visit a camp. After his seizure the President was to be carried across the Potomac. This plan failed, as did also the one subsequently arranged to kidnap the President in the theatre. ATZEROTT denied that he aided in the plot to murder the President.

The state of mind which led to their final destination, and thus was completed the memorable history of that conspiracy which three months ago plunged our people into the lowest depths of grief.

A DREAM.

ALL yesterday I was spinning.
Sitting alone in the sun;
And the livelong day was so lengthy
It lasted till day was done.

I heeded not cloud or shadow
That flitted over the hill,
Or the humming-bee or the swallows,
Or the trickling of the rill.

I took the threads for my spinning,
All of blue summer air,
And a flickering ray of sunlight
Was wound on the reel as there.

The shadows grew longer and longer,
The evening wind passed by,
And the purple splendor of sunset
Was footed in Western sky.

But I could not leave my spinning,
For so fair my dream had grown
I heeded not, hour by hour,
How the sun rose and went down.

At last the gray shadows fell round me,
And the night came dark and chill,
And I rose and ran down the valley,
And left my dream on the hill.

I went up the hill this morning
To the place where my spinning lay—
There was nothing but glistening dew-drops
Remained of my dream to-day.

THE PATAGONIAN BROTHERS.

WE are not related. His name is John Griffiths, and I am William Waltur; and we called ourselves the Patagonian Brothers because we thought it a big little and original title. We met by chance, about six years since, on the race-course at Shrewsbury, and took a mutual liking, and went partners in a tour through the midland counties. We had never seen or heard of each other up to that time, and have not been good friends. We never greatly intimate. I knew nothing of his past life, nor he of mine; and I never asked him my opinion on any subject. I am particular to have this all clear from the beginning; for I am a plain man, telling a plain story, and I want no one to misunderstand me, or to find I am about to relate.

We made a little money by our tour. It was not much; but it was more than either of us had been able to save before, so we agreed to stay together and try our fortune in London. This time we got an engagement at a play-house for a month, and when the summer came, joined a traveling circus, and roamed about as before.

The circus was a capital thing—a republic, so to say, in which all were equals. We had a manager to whom we paid a fixed salary, and the rest went shares in the profits. There were times when we did not even clear our expenses; there were towns where we made ten and fifteen pounds a night; but the bad luck went along with the good, and, on the whole, we prospered.

We staid with the company two years and a half in all, and played at every town between York and London. During that time we had found leisure to improve. We knew each other's weight and strength now to a hair, and grew bolder with experience; so that there was scarcely a new feat brought out any where which we did not learn, even to the "perch" business, and the trick of walking, head downward, on a marble ceiling. The feat is, that we were admirably matched, which, in our profession, is the most important of all. Our height was the same, to the sixteenth of an inch, and we were not unlike in figure. If Griffiths possessed a little more muscular strength, I was more active, and even that difference was in our favor. I believe that, in other respects, we suited each other equally well, and I know that, for the three years and a half which we had spent together (counting from our first meeting at Doncaster down to the time when we dissolved partnership with the circus folks) we had never had an angry word. Griffiths was a steady, saving, silent fellow enough, with little gray eyes and heavy black brows. I remember thinking, once or twice, that he was not quite the sort of person I would like for a friend; but that was in reference to no act of his, and only a fancy of my own. For myself, I can live with any one who is disposed to live with me, and have peace and good-will better than any thing in the world.

We had now grown so expert that we resolved to better ourselves and return to London, which we did somewhere about the end of February, or the beginning of March, 1855. We put up at a little inn in the Borough, and looked about for new fields ourselves engaged by Mr. James Rice, of the "Britannia Tavern," at a salary of twenty pounds a week. Now this was a great advance upon all our previous gains; and the Tavern was by no means a bad place for the fraternity in a theatrical point of view.

Situated half-way between the West End and the City, surrounded by a densely populated neighborhood, and kept in the very path of the omnibuses, this establishment was one of the most prosperous of its class. There was a theatre, and a concert-room, and a garden, where dancing and smoking, and rifle-shooting, and supper-eating were going on from eight till twelve o'clock every night all through the summer season, which made the place a real favorite with the working-classes.

Here, then, we were engaged (Griffiths and I), with a promise that our salary should be raised if we proved attractive; and raised it soon was, for we drew enormously. We brought out the prophets of the old-fashioned business; came down, in the midst of fire-works, from a platform higher than the roof of the theatre, and, in short, did more to keep that ever yet was done in our line—ay, and did it well, too, though perhaps it is not my place to say so. At all events, the great colored posters were pasted up all over the town; and our salary was increased to fifteen pounds a week; and the gentlemen who rather shook the boys in the Saturday Post, was pleased to observe that there was no performance in London half so wonderful as that of the Patagonian Brothers (from which I take this epithet), to thank him kindly.

We lodged (of course together) in a quiet street on a hill near Islington. The house was kept by Mrs. Morrison, a respectable, industrious woman, whose husband had been a gas-fitter at one of the theatres, and who was now left a widow with one only daughter just nineteen years of age. She was very good and very pretty, too, and was christened Alice, but her mother called her Ally, and we soon fell into the same habit; for they were very simple, homely people, and we were as much at home as if we had all been living together in the same house for years.

I am not a good hand at telling a story, as, I dare say, you have found out by this time—and, indeed, I never did sit down to write one out before—so I may as well come to the point at once, and confess that I loved her. I also fancied, before many weeks were over, that she did not altogether dislike me; for a smile was given me twice as sharp as it is in love, and there is not a blush, or a glance, or a word, that the heart can conferre to make hope upon. So one day, when Griffiths was out, I went down stairs to the parlor, where she was sitting by the window at work, and took my courage in both hands.

"Ally, my dear," said I, stopping her right hand from working, and taking it up in both of mine; "Ally, my dear, do you want to get rid of me?"

She blushed, and turned pale, and blushed again, and I felt the pulses in her little soft hand throbbing like the heart of a frightened bird, but she never answered a syllable.

"Ally, my dear," said I, "I am a plain man. I am thirty-two years of age. I am not given how to flatter like some folks, and I have had but very little book-learning to speak of. But, my dear, I love you; and though I don't suppose that you are the first girl I ever fancied, I can truly say that you are the first I ever cared to make my wife. So, if you'll take me, my dear, I want to get you married to you as long as I live."

What answer she made, or whether she spoke at all, is more than I can undertake to tell, for my ideas were all confused; but I only remember that I kissed her, and felt very happy, and glad, and firm. Morrison came into the room, she found me with my arm clasped round my darling's waist.

I scarcely know why it was that I never told the change in John Griffiths; but that it was somewhere about this time I am tolerably certain. It did not last for long, and was caused on account of trifles that, after all, are matters of feeling more than matters of fact; but others saw the change as well as myself, and no one more than I, considering that he grew to be more silent and unsociable than ever. He kept away from home as much as possible. He spent all his Sundays out, starting away the first thing after breakfast, and not coming back again till close upon midnight. He even put an end to our old friendly custom of walking home together after our night's work was over, and joined a sort of tap-room club that was kept by a dozen or so of idle fellows belonging to the theatre. Worse than this, he scarcely exchanged a word with me from morning till night, even when we were at meals. He watched me about the room as if I had been a thief. And sometimes, though I am sure I never wronged him willingly in my life, I caught him looking at me from under those black brows of his as if he hated me.

More than once I laid my hand upon his sleeve as he was hurrying away on Sundays, or turning off toward the club-room at night, and said, "Griffiths, have you got any thing against me?" or "Griffiths, won't you come home to a friendly glass with me to-night?" But he either shook me off without a word, or muttered some sulky denial that sounded more like a curse than a civil answer; so I got tired of peace-making at last, and let him go his own way and choose his own company.

The summer season drew fast advanced, and our engagement at the Belvidere had well-nigh ended, when I began to bore the furniture, and Ally to prepare her wedding things. Matters continued the same with John Griffiths; but, when the day was fixed, I made up my mind to be easy, to dismiss and drive him to the church and the dinner. The circumstances of that invitation are as clear in my memory as if the whole affair had taken place this morning.

It was on the twenty-ninth of July (I am particular about dates), and there had been a rehearsal call to rehearsal at one o'clock that day. The weather was warm and hazy, and I started early that I might not feel it so tired; for I knew that, what with the rehearsal, and the new piece, and the Terrific Descent, I should have enough to do before my day's work was done. The consequence was that I arrived about twenty minutes too soon. The gardens had a dreary look by daylight; but they were pleasant-ir, any how, than the theatre; so I loitered up and down among the smoky trees, and watched the various people file stairs off the hall in the summer-houses, and thought how shabby the fountains looked when they were not playing, and what miserable imitation concerns were the Stalactite Caves and the Cosmorama Grottoes, and all the other attractions which looked so fine by the light of colored lamps and fire-works.

Well, just as I was sauntering on, turning these things over in my mind, whom should I see in one of the summer-houses but John Griffiths! He was lying forward upon the table, with his face resting upon his clasped hands, sound asleep, with a little ale-bottle and a pint of cold beer beside him, and his stick had fallen near his chair. I could not be mistaken in Griffiths' big fists, which always went up and touched him smartly on the shoulder.

"A fine morning, John!" says I. "I thought I was here early; but it seems that you were before me, after all."

He sprang to his feet at the sound of my voice, as if he had been struck, and then stood regularly away.

"What did you wake me for?" he said, sullenly.

"Because I have news to tell you. You know that the sixth of August will be our last night here. Well, mate, on the seventh, please God, I'm going to be married."

"Case you!" he interrupted, turning a livid face upon me, and an eye that glared like a lion's. "Curse you! How dare you come to me with that tale, you smooth-faced hound?—to me, of all men living?"

I was so little prepared for this burst of passion that I had nothing to say, and so he went on:

"Why can't you let me alone? What do you tempt me for? I've kept my hands off of you till now—"

He paused and bit his lip, and I saw that he was trembling from head to foot. I am no coward—it's not likely that I should be in a Penjamin Boxiana if I was. But the sight of his hatred seemed to turn me, for the moment, quite sick and giddy.

"My God!" I said, leaning up against the table, "what do you mean? Are you mad?"

He made no answer, but looked straight at me, and then walked away. I don't know how it was, but from that moment I knew all. It was written, somehow, in his face.

"Oh, Lor'!" I said to myself with a kind of groan, and sat down on the nearest bench. I believe that at that moment I scarcely knew where I was or what I was doing.

I did not see him again till we met on the stage, about an hour afterward, to go through our scene in the circus. It was a grand piece, with a great deal of firing, and hot water, and a live camel in the last act of Mahomet and the Seven Sleepers, and slaves, performing before the Rajah in the hall of Candelabras. Excepting that it cost a great deal of money, I don't see why I ever knew about the piece, and, upon my word, I don't believe that any body else knew much more. By this time I had, of course, grown to be a real composer; but I could see that Griffiths had been drinking, for his face was flushed and his balance unsteady. When the rehearsal was over, the piece called us into his private room and brought out a decanter of sherry, with which, I must say, he was always as liberal as any gentleman could be.

"Patagonians," says he, for he had a wonderfully merry way with him, and always called me that name, "I suppose you would make no objection to a little matter of extra work and extra pay on the eighth, just to end the season with something stunning—hey?"

"No, no, Sir, not we," replied Griffiths, in a sort of imitation of humor that wasn't natural to him. "We're ready for any thing. Is it the flying business you spoke about the other day?"

"Better than that," said the manager, filling up the glasses. "It's a new French feat that has never yet been done in this country, and they call it the trapeze. Patagonians, your health!"

So we drank his in return, and Mr. Rice explained all about it. It was to be an exhibition of posturing and a balloon ascent both in one. At some distance below the car was to be secured a triangular wooden frame-work, which frame-work was called the trapeze. From the lower pole, or base of this triangle, one of us was to be suspended, with a ligature of strong leather attached to his ankle, in case of accidents. Just as the balloon was rising and this man ascending head-downward, the other was to catch him by the hands and go up also, having, if he preferred it, some band or other to bind him to his companion. In this position we were then to go through our customary performances, continuing them so long as the balloon remained in sight.

"All this," said Mr. Rice, "sounds much more dangerous than it really is. The motion of a balloon through the air is so steady and imperceptible that, but for the knowledge of being up above the earth's surface, you will scarcely feel any difference in the gardens. Besides, I am speaking to brave men who know their business, and are not to be dashed by a little—hey, Griffiths?"

Griffiths brought his hand down heavily upon the table, and made the glasses ring again.

"I'm ready, Sir," said he, with an oath. "I'm ready to do it alone if any man here is afraid to go with me!"

He looked at me as he said this with a sort of mocking laugh that brought the blood into my face.

"If you mean that for me, John," said I, quickly, "I'm no more afraid than yourself; and, if that's all about it, I'll go up to-night!"

If I was to try from now till this day next year I never could describe the expression that came over his face as I spoke those words. It seemed to turn all the evening of my life black. I could not understand it then; but I understood it well enough afterward.

Well, Mr. Rice was mightily pleased to find us so willing, and a very few more words ended the matter. Mr. Staines and his famous Wurtemberg balloon were to be ready to proceed after the evening's colored lamps were to be hired, and Griffiths and I were to receive twelve pounds apiece for the evening, over and above our regular pay.

Poor Ally! In the midst of the excitement I had forgotten her, and it was not till I was out of the theatre and talking slightly with her that I remembered she must be told. For my own part I did not believe there was the slightest danger. I knew that how her fears would magnify every thing, and the nearer I came toward Islington the more uncomfortable I felt. After all, I had given such a promise.

"Come, John," says I, "our share of this business is done. Don't you think we might as well get going and be off?"

He was hanging below just then, holding on by my two hands, and had been hanging so quite quiet a long time, that I didn't seem to hear me, and no wonder, for the clouds were gathering about us so thickly, that even the voice of the gentleman who spoke to me muffled, and I could hardly see for a yard before me in any direction. So I called to him again and repeated my question.

He made no answer, but shifted his grasp from my hand to my wrist, and then up to the middle of my arm, and then to my shoulder, and so on till the same nearly on a level. There he paused, and I felt his hot breath on my cheek.

"William Ives," he said, so hoarsely, "swear to-morrow to have been your wedding-day?"

Something in the tone of his voice, in the questioning, in the words, all fearful solitude, struck me with horror. I tried to shake off his hands, but he held too fast for that.

"Well, mate, if I was?" said I after a moment. "You needn't grip so hard. Catch hold of the pole, will you? and let go of my arms."

He gave a sudden laugh, but never stirred.

"I suppose we're about two thousand feet high," he said, "and the balloon is the mate he had something between his teeth. "If either of us was to fall he'd be a dead man before he touched the ground."

I would have given the world at that moment to be able to see his face; but what with my own head being downward, and all his weight hanging to my arms, I had not power to turn it more than an inch.

"John!" I exclaimed, "what do you mean? Catch hold of the pole and let me do the same. My head is on fire."

"Do you see this?" said he, catching my arms a couple of inches higher up, and looking right into my face. "Do you see this?"

It was a large, open clasp-knife, and he was holding it with his teeth. His breath seemed to his very cheeks and eyes.

"I bought it this evening—I bid it in my belt—I waited till the clouds were thick, and there was no soul to see. Presently I shall cut you away from the balloon. I took an oath that you should never have her, and you shall not keep it."

A dimness came over my eyes and every thing grew red. I felt that in another minute I should be insensible. I was not afraid, I was already, and, letting my arms free, made a spring at the pole overhead.

That spring saved me. Our wrists were bound together, and as he rose he drew me along with him; for I was so faint and giddy that I could make no effort to help myself.

I saw him hold by the pole with his left hand; I saw him take the knife in his right; I felt the cord of rope between his wrist and mine, and then—

And then the horror of the moment gave me back my strength, and I clung to the frame-work just as the thong gave way.

We were separated now, and I was still secured to the trapeze by one ankle. He had only his arms to trust to—and the knife.

Oh, the deadly, deadly strife that followed! it sickens me to think of it. His only hope now lay in the cursed weapon; and so, clinging to the woodwork with one hand, he strove to stab me with the other.

It was life or death now, and I grew desperate. To feel his murderous clutch upon my throat, and, in the silence of the hideous struggle, to hear the report of a Champagne cork, followed by a peal of careless laughter, overhead— Oh, it was worse than death, a hundred times over!

I can not tell how long we clung thus, each with a hand upon the frame-work. It may have been only a few seconds; but it seemed like hours to me. The question was simply which should be strangled first.

Presently his grips relaxed, his lips became deadwhite, and a shudder ran through every fibre of his body. He had turned giddy!

Then a cry burst from him—a cry like nothing human. He made a false clutch at the trapeze, and reeled over. I caught him, just in time, by the belt round his waist.

"It's all over with me," he groaned between his set teeth. "It's all—over—with me! Take your revenge!"

Then his head fell heavily back, and he hung, a dead weight, on my arm.

I did take my revenge; but it was hard work, and I was already half exhausted. How I contrived to hold him up, to unbind my foot, and to crawl, in spite of the ropes, is more than I can tell; but my presence of mind never failed me for an instant, and I suppose the excitement gave me a sort of false strength while it lasted. At all events I did it, though I now only remember clinging over the basket-work, and seeing the faces of the gentlemen all turned up from one as I sank to the bottom of the car, scarcely more alive than the burden in my arms.

He is a patient man now, an Australian settler, and, as I am told, well to do in those parts.

This is my story, and I have no more to tell.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

PROVINCIAL PHILOSOPHY.—A young friend of ours, who has been spending the dog-days of London on beer he imbibes, says that although it is quite true that "one may grow done in a minute," yet in summer like this makes one swallow—a good deal of liquid.

A VIEW WIG, who for the horsewhip's smart, Said to her father, begg'd he'd take her part. "O What is your fault?" said he: "come state the case." "I threw away from me my husband's wig." For which he beat me!" "Dear you, did he! Sith' he has got paid for what I'll beat his wife!"

Every plain girl has one consolation. If she is not a pretty young lady, she will—if she lives, he is a pretty old man.

A wine-merchant once left a supported assistant in his cellar, and said to him, "Now, lest you should drink the wine, I'll tell you what I'll do: I'll put a mark on each cask so that I may know it." He then rubbed his nail across the man's face, and pretended to leave the mark of dash on them. The man drank of the wine, and so he even with his master, chalked it on his nose, and rubbed the thousand.

Women were born, so fate declares,
To nourish our lines and our cares;
And 'tis but just, for by your truth
They're very apt to ruffle both.

TEOLE WHO DON'T USE IT.—A phrenological professor, who had been taking the lungs of our reporter to apply, who is a tall specimen of the human genus, and abounds in that element so much that he could almost supply the ingredient interrogation for wholesome inquiries, and makes a most commanding and interesting chimney-piece, when quietly smoking a cigar. "Young man," said he, in a tone of voice that would have done for Boanerges, "do you know that your lungs are as large as a foot?" "Well," said Bantel, "it may be so; but there is one foot that you are not going to find which I wish to impress on your mind: that there are a great many people who don't use it!" The phrenologist drew the inference, and discontinued the conversation.

RESIGNATION.—"Ned has run away with your wife," said one friend to another. "Poor fellow!" replied the other humbly.

Charles Lamb was in the habit of wearing a white cravat, and in consequence was sometimes taken for a clergyman. Once, at a theatrical representation, a large number of guests, his white cravat caused such a mistake to be made, and he was called on to "say grace." Looking up and down the table, he asked, in his inimitable lisping manner, "Is there no clergyman present?" Something, Sir," answered a guest. "Then," said Lamb, bowing his head, "let us thank God!"

A SOLDIER'S BURIAL.

It was down by the blue Potomac
That we made his lonely grave,
On the steep and wooded hill-side
As it slopes to the river's wave.
By the broad and blue Potomac,
In sound of its murmuring wave,
We left him alone in his slumber,
To take the dream no more.

He was our comrade in battle,
And his heart was warm and brave
And never a thought of danger
Crept in to that manly heart;
And when we came to place him
In his cold and narrow grave,
We felt, though Death was the victor,
How hard it was to part.

He died not amid the conflict,
As he would he might have died,
In the rush and roar of the battle,
When only the craven fear;
'Mid the frenzy and heat and tumult,
When friends fight side by side,
It is easy to die if summoned
In the cause our hearts hold dear.

But death to our comrade came slowly.
In the dull and heated camp,
And we carried his corpse between us
When the air seemed strangely still
With the summer noonday silence,
And only our hollow tramp
Was heard as we gently bore him
To the new-made grave on the hill.

Some solemn words spoke the chaplain,
That were good for the soul to hear;
And ever softly murmured-
The blue Potomac's wave;
And while he spoke there glistened
On the good man's cheek a tear.
And when we had filled, all silent,
Our comrade's new-made grave.

Then all at once on the stillness
The fifes began to play,
Mocking our pain and sorrow
With their voices loud and shrill.
And in step with the pulsing music
We passed from the place away,
And left our comrade to slumber
In his grave on the wooded hill.

CHAPTER XXV.

SAXON RENEWS HIS ACQUAINTANCE WITH THE COLONNAS.

Saxon found the Earl waiting for him at the Sedgebrook station, with a plain phaeton and a long-limbed, bony, black mare, that looked somewhat viciously askance at the new-comer, and would evidently not have consented to stand still for a moment were it not for the groom at her head.

"That's right, Trefalden," said Castletowers, as Saxon emerged from the station with his guncase in his hand and his rug over his shoulder. "Your train's a quarter after time, and the mare has been giving herself as many airs as a spoiled beauty. Jump up, my dear fellow, and let me tell you how glad I am to see you. Brought any horses?"

"Yes, two—since you insisted that I should do so. Here they come."

The Earl turned and glanced at the thoroughbreds, which were now being led down in a traveling costume that left nothing of them visible save their hoofs and their eyes.

"They're as welcome as yourself—if that's not a bad compliment," said he. "I've sent a light cart for your luggage, and my man shall follow with your groom to show him the way. It's only a couple of miles to the park gates. Any thing else?"

There was nothing else; so the groom stepped back, and the mare shook her ears and went away down the road as if she had been shot from a catapult.

"I am delighted you've brought those horses, Trefal'n," said the Earl, as they flew along between the green hedgerows of the pleasant country road. "I don't have really nothing to ride upon. This mare's a demon when her temper is up, and my mother's carriage-horses are as fat and lazy as a pair of aldermen. In fact, I have given over the only tolerable beast in the stables for Miss Colonna's sole use until benefit as long as she remains at Castletowers."

"Miss Colonna!" echoed Saxon.

"A lady who is visiting us," replied the Earl, explanatorily. "You have heard of her father, no doubt—Giulio Colonna, the great Italian patriot. He is living with us also."

"Yes, I have heard of him," said Saxon, who had turned very red, and began to wish himself back again in London.

"He is my mother's oldest friend," continued Castletowers, "and mine too. I don't know what you may have heard of him—few public characters have ever had so many enemies or so many friends—but you must be prepared to like him, Trefalden, for my sake. You may not take to him at first. He is eccentric, absent, somewhat cold, but a man of antique virtue—a man whose grand simplicity of soul is as much out of place in the nineteenth century as Cincinnatus himself would be out of place in a modern drawing-room."

Saxon thought of the twenty francs that Signor Colonna had offered him at Reichenau, and did not kindle at this description, as his friend had anticipated.

"I have heard nothing to his disadvantage," he said, with some constraint. "Is Major Vaughan still with you?"

"Yes, and Burgoyne comes down to-morrow for a week's shooting. We've intend to be quite gay while you are all here."

"What do you mean by 'quite gay?'"

"Why, my mother gives a dinner-party to-morrow, and an evening-party on Saturday; and on Thursday the last meet of the season will be held in our grounds. Then, on Monday, the officers of the Forty-second, now quartered at Guildford, give a great ball, to which our guests are, of course, invited—and so much for the programme, with little variation. It is monotonous, but what can one do at a distance of thirty miles from London?"

"Lead the happiest life in the world, I should think," replied Saxon.

"It is a question of taste and means," said the Earl, with a sigh. "A moiti of field sports, and an everlasting rigmarole of dining and dancing, dancing and dining—that is life in an English country-house. For myself, I prefer the harsher music of whizzing hand."

"Do you mean that you wish to go into the army?"

"I mean that I should like to be a soldier if my sword and my sympathies could go together; but that they never can, so it's of no use thinking about it. Do you see that gray church-steeple ahead, and the green slope beyond, sprinkled over with elms? That's Sedgebrook. Just home with come into sight directly at the turn of the road."

And then the conversation strayed to other topics, and Saxon told his friend how William Trefalden was coming down on Thursday; and by that time they had reached the park gates and were driving up to the beautiful old red house, which looked as if dyed in the sunsets of many centuries.

Then the Earl took his guest round to the stables, built on the princely scale of the old Elizabethan days, and now more than three parts empty. Here Saxon saw the stall-set apart for his two thorough-breds; and presently Major Vaughan came into the yard, white with dust, leading his own beautiful Arabian, Gulnare, and followed by a docile bay, carrying a lady's saddle. The lady, it seemed, had been riding with Mademoiselle Colonna.

After this they strolled about the gardens, and the Earl initiated Saxon into the topography of the smoking-room, the billiard-room, and all that part of the house called the bachelors' quarters; and then the gong was sounded, and it was time to dress for dinner.

It was Saxon's first entry into the society of ladies; and this fact, coupled with his reluctance to meet the Colonnas, made him somewhat nervous on going into the drawing-room. The ladies, however, were not yet down; and he found only a group of four men standing round the fire. Two of these were Castletowers and Major Vaughan; the third he at once recognized for the dark-eyed Italian whom he had met at Reichenau; and the fourth was a perfect stranger.

"My friend, Mr. Saxon Trefalden—Signor Colonna—the Reverend Edwin Armstrong," said Lord Castletowers, getting through the introductions at once with the coolest.

The clergyman bowed somewhat stiffly; but Signor Colonna held out his hand.

"Germain Trefalden, sir," he said, with a smile of singular sweetness. "I have heard much of you, Mr. Trefalden, and rejoice to know you. Is this your first visit to Castletowers?"

It was evident that he had no more remembrance of Saxon than Saxon had of the world before the flood.

At this moment the butler entered. The Earl, with some ceremony, presented his young friend to his mother, and while Saxon was yet bending over her fair hand dinner was announced. The Earl immediately gave his arm to Mademoiselle Colonna, Signor Colonna took Lady Castletowers, and Saxon followed. Thus it happened that the introduction which Saxon most dreaded was altogether omitted, and that he did not even set eyes on the woman's face till he had taken his seat at the dining-table. He then looked up, and, to his intense discomposure, found her superb eyes turned full upon himself.

"My vis-à-vis is, I suppose, your young millionaire?" she said, presently, to Lord Castletowers. "I have met him before; but I can not remember his name."

The Earl laughed and shook his head.

"Impossible," he replied. "He has only been six or eight weeks in England, and during the whole of that time you have not been up to town, I think, for a single day."

"But I may have met him abroad—perhaps at Milan?"

"He has never visited Italy in his life."

"Well, then, in Paris?"

"And I know that he has never been to Paris. In fact, it is more than improbable that you can have seen him before."

"Then I must have dreamed it. I speak thus positively because I know all the story of his life up to this time, and a very curious story it is."

"You must tell it to me," said Mademoiselle Colonna.

"I will, by-and-by; and when you have heard it you will grant that you are only misled by some accidental resemblance."

Mademoiselle Colonna looked at Saxon again. He was talking to Lady Castletowers, and she could scrutinize his features at her leisure.

"I do not think I shall make any such concession to your narrative powers," she said. "The more closely I look at him the more convinced I am that we have not only met, but spoken—and not very long since, either. Why, I recognize the very inflections of his voice."

"Nay, madam, I claim to be a Swiss," Saxon was saying. "I was born in Switzerland, and so were my father and grandfather before me."

"But Trefalden is not a Swiss name," said Lady Castletowers.

"No, Trefalden is a Cornish name. We are of Cornish descent."

The color flew to Olimpia Colonna's face at the discovery conveyed to her by these few words. "It is, then, a case of accidental resemblance," she said, with a troubled look. "I remember all about him now, and he remembers me. He knew he did; I saw it in his face."

"Then you really have met before?"

"Yes, in Switzerland, a few weeks ago. I—I was so unbelievably rude as to refuse him for an ordinary peasant, and I—that is to say, we—offended him cruelly. My father has forgotten all about it; but I have never had the heart to apology by-and-by. I hope he will forgive me."

"Forgive you!" echoed the Earl, in a low, passionate tone.

But Miss Colonna did not seem to hear him.

Later in the evening, when the little party was dispersed about the drawing-room, she turned to Saxon, who was bending over some engravings on a side-table, and said,

"If it were not a presumption and pardon are thought to go hand in hand, I should ask to be introduced by Mr. Trefalden. As it is, I can only hope that he has forgotten me."

Saxon bowed profoundly.

"I should be sorry, concerned for my memory, madam," he replied, "if that were possible."

She looked at him inquiringly.

"Is that a sarcasm," said she, "or a compliment?"

"I did not mean it for either."

"What is it, then?"

"A simple statement of a simple fact. Mademoiselle Colonna is associated in my memory with the very noblest type of my life, and I had tried to forget that I had once had the honor of meeting her it would not have been possible for me to do so. The day I first learned the change in my fortunes."

Miss Colonna smiled and put out her hand.

"What is it, then? I forgive you," she said. "I will not consent to be the one disagreeable episode in so bright a life."

"But I can't forgive you twice over," replied Saxon, bashfully, scarcely daring to touch the tips of her fingers.

"Which means that you had done so already? Thank you. And now we must be friends; and you shall tell me all about my father, who is deeply interested in your free and beautiful country. Would that our own beloved Italy were half so happy!"

And with this she took Saxon's arm, and they crossed over to where her father and Major Vaughan were engaged in earnest conversation.

In the mean while Lord Castletowers was wishing himself in Saxon's place, and thinking how gladly he would have given the best hunter in his stables to be so wronged and so solicited by Olimpia Colonna.

CHAPTER XXVI.

SIGNOR COLONNA'S DEN IN THE OCTAGON TURRET.

Giulio Colonna was never so immersed in political labors as during those eight weeks that he and his daughter had been staying at Castletowers. He sat all day, and sometimes more than half the night at his desk, answering letters, drawing up declarations and addresses, and writing fiery pamphlets in Italian, French, and English. Olimpia helped him for many hours each day, often rising at dawn to correct his proofs, and to write his private correspondence. Every now and then a special messenger would come down from London by the mid-day express; or the electric telegraph dispatches would arrive, full of secret information, and so worded as to be unintelligible to all save the receiver. And sometimes, in the evening, after a hasty summons to the octagon turret, would order out his black mare, and, laten with messages, gallop over to the Sedgebrook railway as if the very lives of his guests depended on his speed.

Then Lady Castletowers would look after him with a little wondering smile; and, turning to the morning visitor who might happen to be sitting with her at the time, would say something about her son's foreign friends, Colonna, and those foolish intrigues in which he still persisted in taking so much interest; or would, perhaps, let fall a word of half-implied regret that her son, the Earl, whose English politics were so thoroughly unexceptionable, should yet suffer himself to be attracted by the romance of this so-called "Italian cause."

But this intrigue went on nevertheless; and her ladyship, who was quite satisfied if Signor Colonna showed himself at the dinner-table, and Olimpia sang occasionally in the drawing-rooms, little dreamed that that room in the octagon turret was the focus of a fast-coming revolution. Fearful letters from the Italian provinces; the bluest blood in her ladyship's veins—were being done daily under her very roof. Strategical operations were mapped out, and military proclamations translated, by the hand of her own son. Subscriptions to the cause poured in by every post. Revolutionary commissions in embryo revolutionary regiments were countersigned by Earls and Viscounts! And in her ladyship's own post-bag, under cover to all kinds of mysterious Smiths and Browns in different quarters of London; and as for musket-money, it was a marvel that the very checks which accumulated in her house for that purpose did not explode, and reduce the place to ashes.

In the mean while a great storm was really brewing, and the leaven of resistance was at work among the masses of Southern Italy. An insurrection had already broken out at Palermo, but it had hitherto attracted no very serious notice in London or Paris. Honorable members attended to it but slightly, as a mere formidable riot, or a salutary warning to sovereigns who misgoverned their subjects, and neglected the advice of their ministers. But Giulio Colonna, in his little room at Castletowers, knew well enough how to interpret the first faint mutterings of that distant thunder. He knew where it would break out next, and where the first shaft of the lightning would fall. His own pen was the conductor—his own breath the wind by which the storm-clouds were driven.

And yet Colonna was no soldier. A braver man never lived; but the sword was not his weapon. A student in his youth, a delicate man at his prime, he was born for the cabinet and not the camp. Bodies need brains as much, and sometimes more, than they need hands; and Colonna was the brain of his party. He was never more useful to his friends, he was never more formidable to his enemies, than when bending over his desk, pale and sleepless, and never weary.

The Earl of Castletowers had described his friend rightly when he spoke of him as a man of antique virtue. His virtues were precisely of the antique type—so precisely that his detractors ranked some of them but little above vices. In his creed, as in the creed of the Roman citizens among whom he had lived, the love of country held the highest place. Italy was his God. To serve her he thankfully accepted privation, contumely, personal danger, banishment, and oppression. To serve her he stooped to beg, to dissimulate, to mask hatred with smiles, and to feign friendship. To say that he was ready at any moment to lay down his own life for Italian liberty was to say nothing. He was ready to sacrifice his daughter, like Jephtha; or his dearest friends; or his good repute; or innocent blood, if innocent blood were the indispensable condition of success. These were indeed antique virtues—virtues that had nothing in common with the spirit of Christian chivalry. In the worst enemies existed a story that Giulio Colonna was a hero and a patriot. His fiercest detractors never heard a doubt of his sincerity. But it was a significant fact that his bloodest worshipers, ready as they were to compare him with every Italian name from the glory of classic Greece and Rome, never dreamed of linking his name with that of Bruce or Bayard, Wallace or La Rochejaquelein. He was, in very truth, more Pagan than Christian, and they instinctively recognized the fact.

Such was Giulio Colonna—a great man, a noble man, an heroic man, after his kind; a man of vast intellectual powers, of untiring steadfastness; of invaluable energy and resources; but a man wholly dominated by a single idea, and unable to recognize any but his own arbitrary standard of right and wrong.

It was the morning after Saxon's arrival at Castletowers. The three young men were out with their guns and dogs, and Olimpia Colonna was busy together in their quiet study in the octagon turret. It was a very small room—almost round—with one deep mullioned window, overlooking a formal space of the garden. A few prints on the walls, a few books on the shelves, a writing-table heaped with letters and papers, three or four chairs, and a davenport in the recess of the window, were all the furniture it contained. At the davenport sat Olimpia, copying a long list of memoranda, while her father was busy with the voluminous correspondence at the larger table. He had received a budget of some forty letters by that post, and was going through them rapidly and methodically, indorsing each for future reference, selecting others for immediate reply, and flinging the rest into a waste-paper basket beside his chair. When the last was disposed of his daughter lifted up her head, and said:

"What news from Italy, padre mio?"

The Italian sighed wearily.

"None," he replied. "None of any value. A few insignificant skirmishes, but nothing new to tell. Things remain about the same in Sicily. Garibaldi wants money. Nothing can be done without it—at least nothing worth doing."

"Better to attempt nothing than make a useless demonstration," said Olimpia, quickly.

"Ay—far better."

"And all from Italy?"

"All."

"And from London? I thought I saw Lord Brecontry's handwriting."

"You've sends a check for twelve pounds; and here are three or four others, and a subscription from Birmingham—not twenty-five pounds in all!"

Olimpia rose, and laid her hand lovingly upon her father's shoulder.

"Do not be discouraged, padre mio," she said. "The movement is as yet scarcely begun, and our friends have not reached the true exercise of the crisis. The English, we must remember, are not roused to enthusiasm by a few words. When the time comes for them that our people are in earnest they will help us with hearts and hands."

"And in the mean while our volunteers are to be slaughtered like sheep for want of proper weapons!" replied Colonna, bitterly. "No, Olimpia, it is now that we need funds—now, when the struggle is scarcely begun, and the weak lies all before us. Without these no real discipline without arms, food, and clothing; and without discipline all the valor in the world is of no avail. While can weaponless men do to prove themselves in earnest?

"Die!" said she, with kindling check and eye.

"Yes—we can all do that; but we prefer to do it with something better than a pike or a scythe in our hands.

Saying this he pushed back his chair, and began walking gloomily up and down the narrow space between the window and the door. He came presently to a sudden halt, looked full into his daughter's eyes, and said:

"We want twenty-five thousand pounds, at the very least, before ten more days have passed over our heads."

"So much as that? Alas! it is impossible."

"I am not sure that it is impossible," said Colonna, still looking at her.

"No? what do you mean?"

"Sit down, my child—here, by my side—and I will tell you."

She sat down, and he took her hand between both of his own. Perhaps her heart throbbed for a moment in some vague apprehension of what might next be said; but neither her face nor her hand betrayed emotion.

"There is a young man in this house," said the Italian, "to whom such a sum as twenty-five thousand pounds would be of less importance than a handful of bajocchi to one of our volunteers."

"Mr. Trefalden?"

"Mr. Trefalden. He is worth four or five millions."

"Yes—I remember. We were talking of it at breakfast-time, you know."

"We were; and I promised myself at the time that I would move heaven and earth to gain that young man's name."

"It will not be difficult."

"In the ordinary degree not at all; but we must do more than that."

"It is hopeless to dream that he will give us twenty-five thousand pounds," said Miss Colonna, hastily.

"I mean him to give us a million."

"A million. Are you mad?"

"I mean him to give us a million—two millions—three millions—all he possesses, if less than all will not suffice to set our Italy free! Listen, darling mia; we have here in our hands a strange story of this young man's life. We know how pure, and pastoral, and unworldly it has been. He and him simple and enthusiastic as a child—his heart open to every generous impression—his whole nature open to every sense of beauty. To such a nature all high things are possible—with such a nature all that we desire may be found. I look upon this youth as the destined liberator—as the destined sacrifice!"

Olimpia sighed and shook her head.

"If he were a Turk," she said, "it would be easy—and justifiable."

"Justifiable!" echoed her father, with an angry gesture. "In our holy cause all means are justifiable. How often must I repeat that to you, Olimpia?"

"It is a point, padre mio, on which we can never think quite alike," she replied, gently. "Let it pass."

He dropped her hand, rose abruptly, and walked restlessly to and fro, muttering to himself. She also rose, and stood waiting till he should speak again. Then he drew his hand across his brow, and said, harshly:

"The freedom of this work must rest chiefly on you, Olimpia."

"I will do what I can," she replied.

"Do you know what you have to do?"

"I think so. I have done it often enough before."

Colonna shook his head.

"No," he said, "that is not enough. You must make him love you—you must make him marry you."

"Father!"

"It is the only certain way to achieve our purpose. He is young and impressionable—you have beauty, fascination, eloquence, and that nameless charm of the will and sympathy of others which has already won hundreds of ardent spirits to the cause. In a week he will be at your feet."

"You ask me to sell myself!" exclaimed Olimpia, with a magnificent scorn upon her lip that would have become an offended goddess.

"For Italy."

She clasped her hands together in a whirl, passionate way, and went over to the window.

"For Italy," repeated Colonna, solemnly. "For the sake of which I have consecrated you, my only child, since the moment when you were first laid, smiling, in my arms. For the cause in which my youth and manhood have been spent. For the cause in which I should not hesitate to go to the stake to-morrow, or to shed your heart's blood with my own hand!"

"I had rather give my heart's-blood than do this thing," said Olimpia, with averted face.

"Do you know that of choice there is no palm his branch shall be severed," replied her father, sternly.

She made no answer, and for some moments they were both silent. Then Colonna spoke again.

"With money now at our command," he said, "success would be certain. Without it, nothing but failure awaits us. Twenty-five thousand pounds, judiciously spent, would equip six thousand men; and if such a force stationed at his back Garibaldi would enter Naples in the course of a few days. But what does he say himself—that whatever is done, must be done in the name of Sardinia? In the name of Sardinia, that gives neither a soldier nor a sou to the struggle! In the name of Sardinia, whose king dare not countenance our effort, but who is ready to reap the fruits of our victories! No, no, Olimpia mia—it is not twenty-five thousand pounds that we need. It is a million. With a million we should free not only the Sicilies but the Romagna, and reconstruct the great republic. With a million we may reject the patronage of Victor Emanuel and the whole monarchical party!"

"With but one million?" said Miss Colonna, doubtfully.

"With but one—or two, if two be needed, and we have two at command. What is one man's wealth, when weighed in the balance, in comparison with results such as these? What is any private interest, when weighed against the honor and freedom of a great country?

Again Olimpia was silent.

"And this," pursued he, eagerly, "with a Roman senate at the Capitol, and a Dictator at the head of the Roman legions, we shall do that which Cæsar did not! Cæsar failed—we shall not accomplishing. We shall expel the Austrian from the soil, and buy back Venetia with our blood!"

Olimpia turned at last. Her face was very pale, and the burnished gold of her hair crowned her in the twilight like a glory.

"Enough," she said, calmly. "This young man's wealth shall be bought for Italy, if aught that I can give will purchase it."

Colonna took her in his arms, and kissed her brow.

"There speaks the true Colonna!" said he. "Had my daughter even given her heart to some other, I should have expected this concession—have counted her love as nothing in the forest of our Italian chivalry; but as it is, I think her duty and her love will yet go together."

"Nay—we will put love out of the question," said she, coldly.

"Heaven grant that I may live to see that day when, through thy deed, my Olimpia, our beloved country shall be free from the shores of the Adriatic to the Straits of Messina!"

"Amen," replied Olimpia, and left the room.

A REVERIE.

ALONE in my bachelor room, Nellie,
I'm sitting and pondering o'er
Some letters that lie on the table—
Your hand traced them, Nellie, of yore,
And your picture is lying beside them,
The golden hair rippling o'er

I'm musing and thinking of you, Nellie,
Of the "Songs of former time,"
Of your merry laugh's glad music,
Of the "Choir meeting," and dance,
Of our walk to the "Choir meeting,"
And of much I can not rhyme.

The years that have passed are ten, Nellie,
Since I first met you and knew,
And the stars looked down through the locust-trees
And witnessed our solemn vow—
How will this be, Nellie, when kept, Nellie,
Our hearts can make answer now.

We were sad as we said "Good-by," Nellie,
'Neath the shade at your father's door,
But we vowed we would love for aye, Nellie,
As none ever loved before.
Thus we parted—I to the West, Nellie,
And thou to the sunny South.

Our college days were past, Nellie,
And I buckled Hope's armor on
To shield in the hour of battle,
And guard still the vow done;
So, jostling 'gainst the world, Nellie,
At last the victory won.

The hour of victory came, Nellie,
Alas! too late it came,
The tongue of the slanderer hissed, Nellie,
Plotting a story of shame;
And she laughed when she made you believe, Nellie,
A lie so quite worthy of such.

* * * * * * *

The years that have passed are ten, Nellie,
Each fraught with that bitter pain;
I never have loved but you, Nellie,
And never can love again;
For the love I cherished for you, Nellie,
The frosts of ten winters have slain.

INTERESTING ITEMS!

TALK DARLING.—Some people are great talk-bearers in their families. They are the mischief-makers of the station. They delight to see the amusement which follows the communication of their tales. Sometimes they know nothing which their own brains have produced will interest the hearer; often they do not know that the narrative is to be the centre of attentive listeners; and so instead of it they talk scandal; they mar any way they wish.

But they can speak about the unexpected misfortunes of the neighbor; they can tell of the quarrels of families of the kind are always delighted when they happen to hear it told it. They know exactly how to throw light and shade upon the picture of the unhappy family—and they have the best advantage. They are not satisfied, like some inferior talkers, with the mere relation of facts; they kind of have an artistic instinct for what will be effective. They will not lose the opportunity if there is a death in the neighbor overtaken by an accident, but it is a real comfort to them to know that they are the first to tell it. Not only reflected for a moment they would discover, to their disappointment, that the sad and the unfortunate circumstances of human life have been to them only fresh material for adding to the amusement of their friends, to create and awaken the curiosity of their friends.

IMPOSITION.—Some years ago a gentleman was all repeating a story about an Englishman who has gone over to Paris to get a patent for a new jackpocket keep—a false pocket, made on the plan of an eel-basket. Dishonesty is the fish that gets in, lets out and can't back, and so is caught in fagrante delicto. The inventor sought out Isaac, a young woman, in an omnibus, but he let her off.

SIR MATTHEW HALE SAYS: "Converse not with a liar, a swearer, nor a man of obscene or wanton language; for either he will corrupt you, or at least it will hazard your reputation to be of his making; and, if it doth neither, yet it will be a loss of precious time, and worse than lost, if it will be troublesome to you in after-time; and the returns of the remembrance of such things are bad. Converse with a silent hoard of this nature will haunt you when your thoughts should be better employed."

AMONG the year 14 of the Christian era the annual product of gold and silver was $6,000,000; in 1492 it was only $25,000; in 1850 it was $250,000,000; and, in 1865, $400,000,000. In the year 14 the gold and silver in existence is estimated at $1,275,000,000, and in 1865 at $10,563,000,000. The whole amount of gold and silver obtained from the earth, from the earliest periods to the present time, is estimated at $21,372,000,000.

FEW of us are happy enough to be the members of an unbroken family circle. Some or later death snaps the healthiest home, and a Christmas or a birthday festival is sometimes overcast by recalculating the living of some "vanished hand" or voice that is still forever. Now it is Tim, whose place at the table is empty, and now it is merry nose; or again it is the patriarch of the flock, whose venerable presence is missed to make the silver-corner look sacred. The "full sergeant" will not be filled. There is a vacancy in the most favored interest in his terrible visits; but the inevitable moment will arrive when three times the usual number shutters will gladden to our neighbors that there is Death in our house. What a fearful thought! Every one of us must be prepared for the suit of a beloved friend or relation has departed! Even the most sanctified and light-hearted feel the sacred loftiness of the hour. Silence reigns in the chamber where the dead man lies, and throughout the whole house the feet of the mourner falls softly, the voice naturally sinks into a whisper, and, when we can, we can but bear to part with the well-known form now vacant of its spirit. Then comes the last look, and the last kiss, and the last fare." We dote the brow with flowers. We delay till the last minute that we can delay, and it is only then that we begin really to feel the bitterness of bereavement. At length, and it is often a relief when it comes, all that can be done that tenderness or delicacy can suggest, we carry forth our cold dead to the grave. A horrid funeral is singularly revolting to civilized habits and sensitive dispositions. The jeering boys who run after the hearse, and as they are cold. He still retains in a northern climate a custom which the Greeks of the last perhaps rendered necessary. Yet even in the East some tribes seem to have been influenced by the same instinct as to speedy interment with marks most Christian nations. Herodotus, indeed, tells us of a people among the Arabians who never buried their dead at all. They placed the bodies of their deceased friends within the walls of their towns, where they afterward carried forth to the cemetery near the city. Among this people, at any rate, no one was alone. Among this people, at any rate, there can have been no lonely graves.

A LOTTERY FOR A HUSBAND.—In the Highland parish of Abernethy a most singular scheme figures, chances, etc., proposes to open a lottery under the following conditions: All widows and maidens between the ages of twenty and thirty-two are invited to buy of him a ticket at the price of 10s. 6d. Sterling, and the result at this figure the drawing will take place. There will be only one prize, and it will be the husband which any widow or maid of the above the young gentleman for her husband, and partake with him the profits to be derived from the £300 produced by the lottery.

THERE are two things which are often confounded—charity and economy—which are impossible to be distinct without being compassionate, but many a man is compassionate without being charitable. The reason is, that charity is a principle of the human mind, while compassion is only one of its many instincts. Such a thing as compassion is observed even in animals, and therefore the Power which gave it to them has not to speedy exercise with marks most Christian nations. The reason is, that charity is a principle of the human mind, while compassion is only one of its many instincts. Such a thing as compassion is observed even in animals, and therefore the Power which gave it to them has not to speedy exercise themselves beneath the level of humanity, but every bitter kind of life is open to them upon seeing a fellow-creature fall into the water, jumps after him without a moment's delay, at peril of his own life, and, if he gets a very noble thing no doubt, but many a dog has done the same. And a man who falls into a river merely excites laugh, shows that he is not a stick or a stone, but he may be a very bad man for all that. So, if a goose, or a rabbit falls on of a goose which, having fallen in with a quantity of the same species, and relied on their own, first filled its own stomach and then walked up to its starving companions and gave them a share of what it had got—is the place to share the benefit of its lucky discovery. Certainly compassion is a benevolent element in charity, but it is no more charity itself than taste is digestion, or hanging without a conscience is murder. Charity is the impression of the moment, drops a kind word or a gift to alleviate a present misery, and having thus discharged itself, passes on to leave the case as it was. Charity, on the contrary, looks to the cause of the suffering, and the future prospects of the sufferer. It not only wishes to relieve the present misery, but to guard him against a recurrence of the evil, and to restore him to his normal condition.

HOW SCOLLARS ARE MADE.—Costly apparatus and splendid cabinets have been contrived to make scholars. In all circumstances, as a man is, under God, the maker of his fortunes, so he is the maker of his own mind. To the Creator has so constituted the human intellect that it can grow only by and through effort. Joy in its own action it will most certainly and necessarily grow. Every man must, therefore, do as Jacob did when he wrestled with the angel—hook and teacher and his help; the work is his. A man is not educated when he has the ability to examine, as an act of emergency, all his mental powers in vigorous exercise to effect this particular object. It is not the man who has seen most or has read most who can do this; such a one is in danger of becoming a pedant. He is not a student, for an overloaded mass of other men's thoughts. Nor is he the student who has only a fair or even average capacity; the greatest of all the warriors that went to the siege of Troy was Ajax, whose preeminence became him had given him strength, and he carried the largest bow, but because of his strength he could not have to aim.

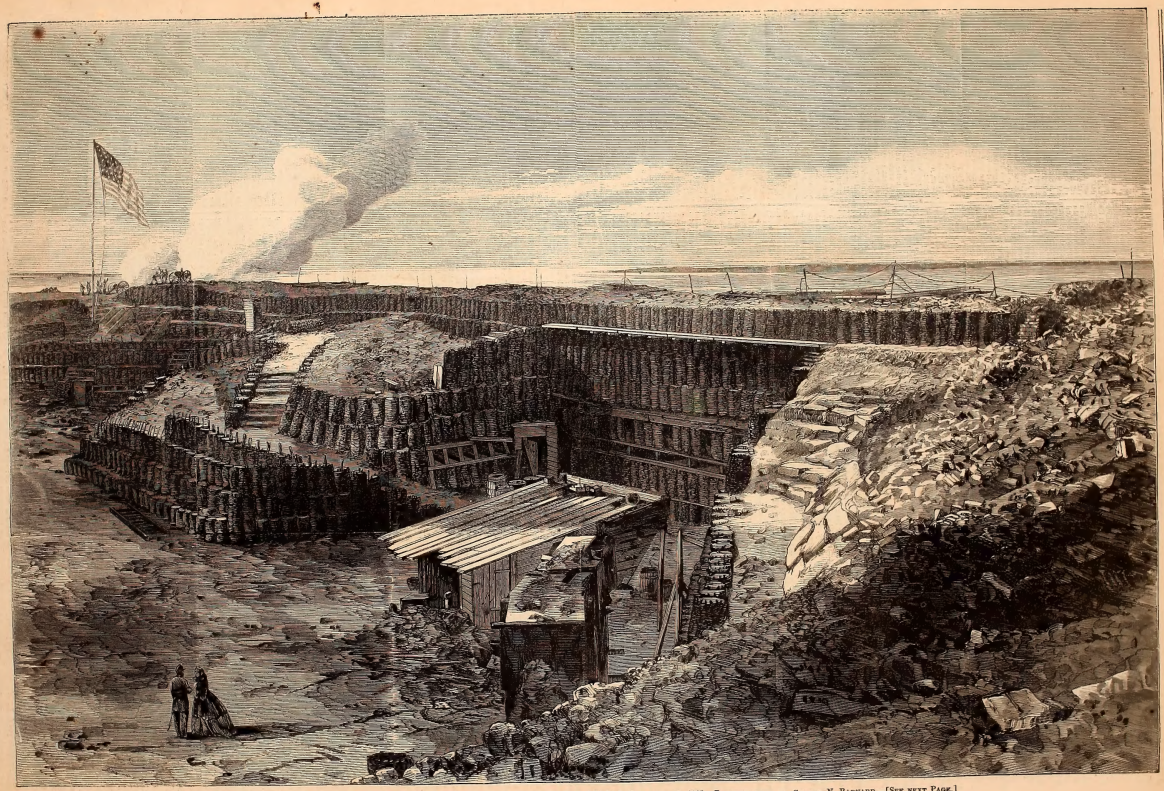
"IT MUDDY BE WORSE!"—"Cock-a-doo!—Cock-a-doo! cock! cock! cock! it's utterly impossible; if I had spirits for it this cold weather, I would not say the words to give up my throat and prevent me. No more crowing for me, Sam!" So thought Chanticleer, Cock, as he stood on November morning, a heap of rubbish, dingy feathers, on the top of a rough fence, and looked dejectedly down on a small house in town.

The hens, who were natives, went on quietly picking up the broken potato thrown out to them, and took no notice. But a fine young cock, who had been in the country round at his finely-arched feathers that had a week before graced the tail of a handsome bird—"don't you see how dirty and shabby it is? And my wattles and my comb—they were as red as coral! I'll not crow, I'm resolved!" So he was getting yellow, and no doubt my coat is too. What was my tyranny to the cruel tyranny of these farm-yards, where I was the admiration of so many hens, and where I was sure to have the best of everything? Ah, Sam, I call this the climax of oppression and wrong, and myself the greatest victim of it!"

The hens still picked away, though he looked at them in sympathy; and Chanticleer descended to the ground hearts being but little braver than chickens), but they still kept their distance, and would not notice him.

Half offended, the discomfited cock was about to take himself off, when he observed a little boy who had left in a small cage on the wall began to sing, and went through it in such a way that the astonished cock stood rigorous wing to chant the glories of his own voice.

The Cock listened, and his head began to hang down, puff up, then shook himself, and he began to look quite firm and resolute position; for it stood on the ground, and, with a flourish of extra energy, he had posed throughout!



"Cock-a-doodle-doo!" if you, whose happiness, every one knows, is to crow, will not crow, I will!" he said.

And the whole family in your humility country home, can sing so sweetly as I can, and I will! Cock-a-doodle-doo! I am no longer captive, I may well put up with my troubles; for I am determined to be free as I was born!"

And with these words he had thought all this he set up as fine a crow as ever came from his dear farm-yard, and began to make the best he could of his breakfast.

INDEMNITIES.—It is common enough to hear people announce that, for their part, they have given up expecting gratitude in this world, and that in such circumstance issues to leave it to Providence to reward them for their personal one. Nobody talks much about ingratitude in the abstract; but nothing is more interesting when brought home in some marked way to ourselves. Now, though it is only too frequent a truth that there is such a thing as ingratitude, we think it will be granted by whoever has listened to this strain that there always arises a misgiving as to the justice, in particular instances, of accusing a censure upon human nature. If we knew the circumstance well enough, we shall be cases of a defective sympathy. The people who are always sending out their parallels are not people to trust without a searching investigation, because they will unfairly be found self-centred, puzzled-headed, or in some way incapacitated for taking a reasonable and impossible view of their own position and relations. They are cases, in short, to be blamed with the rest of the world in their knowledge, starting-point and of their unsympathetic nature, and of their want the conduct of others, in any critical case which greatly concerns themselves there, in the long run, to abandon alone; they can not take in the complicated relations in which they are involved, and they will be sure to be found will bear the mistress of a household rail at the ingratitude of servants who are on every side betrayed by such kindness has left her for her own convenience or to better her lot. As she looks at the deserted premises, she forgets that the delinquent may have the quite as strongly and kindly felt. The trusty damsel on many bad perhaps given a quiet pew one to faithful service; or, if she was not given to look, perhaps stares bad, but kinder; or she forgot that the kindness has the set-off of many a provocation laid by for others' benefit. As a fact, people are never less pleasant than when they are in a temper, and, of course, the world—that is, whatever it is. We feel implicated in some way; though it is no concern of ours, we find ourselves making common cause with the ingrate. The truth is, ingratitude is no serious a charge as we without very grave consideration—without weighing all sides of the question. There are ungrateful people in the world—people with the moulds supplied by the old writer as always acting and never saying grace; who do whatever they may still give thanks and never say "Thank you;" into whom kindness fall as into a dead sea, and are lost and swallowed up. But there are people who think they have a right to every thing, and only feel grateful when that comes as a gift which should have been theirs by ownership.

HELPERS.—We know no set of people who vary more from themselves than those who profess to help us. There is the fussy, Bigsby helper, who gives more trouble than he saves, and who seems to have undertook the company, who is generally in the way, or setting about the wrong thing, or minding what he is about when he is not minded, saying what ought to be left unsaid, and with the most marked expression and utterance of kindness, eyes, and manner, "Don't trouble yourself, my dear sir, to do for you! what can I do next?" and all the while adding trouble to your trouble instead of diminishing it. Again, there is the timid helper, who can not be left to do a thing by himself, who must be told how to do it, and who finds the performance is to be taken up and joined together: who can not be left to be trusted, and because one deals him, but because he doubts himself. When you want any thing done, he is the plainest in the world to give you minute and, saying, "this must be done," and feel sure that no time has been lost to be obtained, when you have long been perplexed and run to every moment for directions. Then there is the helper who, if he has any sense, runs into the opposite extreme. You say you want such and such a thing done, and before you have time to explain yourself he rushes off to a conclusion, and perhaps comes back with the very thing you do not want, and not by the rush way in which he sets about it. Again, there is the helper who, when you have put him in the right road and look back, sits down to the nail sewing and progress with the work, and is going at full speed. There is the helper who is going at full speed. There is the helper who, when you have left him to work, but not to be left, is nervous and relieved: who wants, as it were, to a little independence of his own, and to be left to himself, and to be left to himself, and requires the regulations of his society to call him to account; who requires conditions, and to have them stated

COLONEL COLYER DISTRIBUTING BERRIES TO THE FIRST NEW YORK CAVALRY ON THE BATTERY.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME IN HOWARD STREET, NEW YORK.

THE State and City of New York have done themselves great credit in the establishment and maintenance of an institution so beneficial to soldiers as is the Soldiers' Home in Howard Street. The object of the institution is to afford to our returning soldiers not otherwise provided for a comfortable home during the time which they may for any cause be detained in the city on their way home. Here the weary are refreshed, the hungry fed, and the sick cared for; and the existence of such a home removes the soldier from many of the discomforts as well as temptations to which he might otherwise be subject. The ship in Howard Street is under the superintendence of Colonel VINCENT COLYER, who has won for himself the respect and love of our citizens for his past efforts in behalf of freedmen. He and his assistants are continually employed in the duties of their kind office. The building provided for the entertainment of soldiers is spacious and comfortable, and is tastefully arranged. It provides a good number of sleeping-rooms, a dining-hall, and an excellent library and reading-room. A portion of the latter is shown in one of the accompanying illustrations. This room is decorated with flowers, and opportunities are afforded for writing to those desiring them.

Colonel COLYER, however, does not confine himself to the soldiers who come to him. When they arrive at the Battery they find him waiting for them, and if they are only detained for an hour or two at the Battery they are sure to come in for some of the good things in the Colonel's store of fruit or berries. Nor are these good offices confined to the soldiers of this State; those on their way to the Eastern States are also included within Colonel COLYER'S beneficent provisions. As the funds of the institution are not over ample for their purpose, it may not be out of place to suggest to our readers that contributions in this direction will increase the number of benefits so richly deserved by our brave soldiers.

COLONEL COLYER DISTRIBUTING FRUIT TO RETURNING SOLDIERS.

FORT SUMTER.

FROM an accurate photograph we are able, on page 460, to present our readers with the most perfect and extensive interior view of Fort Sumter which has yet been published. The Fort came into our possession, with the city of Charleston, on the 18th of February, 1865.

Fort Sumter is probably, taken in connection with the adjacent works, the strongest fortification in the world. After its walls were completely crumbled by our shells it was stronger than when, in 1861, it received the fire of the rebel batteries. The more it was battered the stronger it became. The picture which we give of the interior of the Fort displays the great strength of the work. When it was repossessed by our forces, it was not taken by assault, as Forts Fisher and McAllister were, but by strategy. What Sherman found in his front gave way, and what he left behind him suffered collapse. When he left Fort Sumter in his rear, that work fell without a blow.

THE POTOMAC—1861.

THE light of stars shook through the trees,
The large-eyed moon looked o'er the lawn,
O day, I said, delay thy dawn!
A little whisper stirred the breeze.

A fr[illegible]ened bird thrilled through the place,
A dead leaf fell as my still feet,
And my wild heart, oh lord it beat!
He read my answer in my face.

All night across the moonlit land,
Far southward, where the river runs,
I heard the booming of their guns,
While in his own he held my hand.

Trust God, oh little heart! he said,
And gulloped forth into the light;
That day he rode into the fight,
And there they shot my lover dead.

My stricken soul rose from the dust,
And pushed rebellious hands toward God;
I will not to the earth be trod,
Then art nor wise, nor good, nor just!

And thus it was not sanctified—
My sorrow—and when I did pray:
My end, O God! no more delay,
Now take me to him, Lord, I cried.

One night I dreamed, and he stood by,
Clothed, angel-wise, in love and light.
I durst not touch his robes of white,
He child me with his pitying eye.

Only that look, nor any word,
And I had learned, not all too late,
Had learned to live, and work, and wait,
And my poor faith to life was stirred.

Oh well I knew that not for me
Were robe of white, the palm, the crown,
Till I more worthy them had grown,
Had earned, like him, euthanasy!

[illegible]or sitting still with folded palms,
To nurse my grief through the long years,
But rushed through my bitter tears
Strange mockery in the eternal psalms;

In some far circle from the throne
Content if I, at last, may stand,
He holding in his own my hand,
And our two voices making one—

One voice of praise, prevailing thence Unto the Lamb, upon the Hill—
The far-off memory of ill,
Crowning the long, long recompense.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF

IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY

WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,

Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the Fifth Corps, Volunteer Depot, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup

HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopeless by physicians are frequently cured in a few days, and what we confidently invite the investigations of the fastest-minded and scientific to cures which have no parallel in the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as heretofore as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Constitution Life Syrup acts quick." While others doubt their permanence, and think that diseases can only be cured by the slow, "slow, comparative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the natural balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and speedy remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) DISEASES transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PALPITATION.

It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the cure forms of PALPITATION, that it is needless that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, DIAGNOSIS.

SCROFULA.

SYPHUS, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, SORE EYES, SKIN, &c.

THIS TAINT (HEREDITARY AND ACQUIRED), filling life with untold misery, is the most fatal of constitutional remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.

(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, &c.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in RHEUMATISM and its kindred affections. The most violent pains are almost instantly alleviated—enormous swellings are reduced. Cases, chronic or virulent, of twenty or more years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of MERCURY, removing the Bad Breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatism Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the human face divine, and cause both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy ever proved to be equal.

Moth Patches upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will remove these blotches, and restore the complexion, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, varying rise to Languor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an inherited or enormous condition of that organ, accompanied with bursting or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR

Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay until the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

"A BONA FIDE NOVEL, WRITTEN TO AMUSE."

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Publish this Day
DENIS DONNE.
A NOVEL.
By ANNIE THOMAS,
Author of "On Guard" and "Theo Leigh."
8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

OPINIONS OF THE ENGLISH PRESS.

The author invoked a portion of Miss Braddon's own particular territory when she set out strong upon horses and racing, somewhat less lavishly, but decidedly more correctly, than those accomplished and truthful biographer of Mrs. Mellish. There is nothing but praise to be bestowed upon "Denis Donne." It is a tone fide novel, written in earnest. There is first-rate ability in the development of the women's character. There is first-rate ability in the fusing of the two sexes between the two covers. The plot of the story is original, clever, and interesting. Miss Thomas need not have shrunk from or fear as to the success which will be awarded her among our critical readers.—Morning Post.

There are many people, at least, in these volumes which Miss Thomas should guard most jealously, for there is the material of an excellent comedy in each of them. . . . It is clever, with a cleverness which sometimes requires real genius, full of dashing activity and admirably-contrived plot, and yet has not succeeded.—Saturday Review.—Spectator.

It is pleasant to have a book from the hands of a lady novelist without the usual complement of dungeons and draw-wells, bombast and bigamy. More than this, Miss Thomas displays an even vigor of handling of the two or six sexes.—Athenæum.

Mr. Anthony Trollope could not more vividly photograph the modern English existence. Heartily pleased will most readers be with "Denis Donne;" its characters, men and women whom every body has met, are drawn with wonderful vigor, freedom, and freshness. The world will hear more of the author of "Denis Donne."—Press.

"Denis Donne" is one of the shortest novels we have met with for some time. It is crowded with clever passages, and is, on the whole, well written, and high above that class of novelette of whom Miss Evans (George Eliot) is the first.—Reader.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and can exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. per annum to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7.30 per cent amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return of gold payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $230,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being placed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscription to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, to whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Remarkable Cure of Stiff Knee by Allcock's Porous Plasters.

Her many persons, from stepping on a piece of orange-peel, have been lamed for life. A knee which stiffened when of this kind has just been brought to our notice. A gentleman, from placing the heel of his boot on a piece of orange-peel, was similarly thrown, and his knee-cap sustained his knee. He was six months confined to the house, though he had the best medical advice. As a last resort a very eminent physician was called in to see if any thing more could be done. After examination he said, "My opinion is, your knee will never be bent again." He recommended that the whole leg and knee should be encased in a plaster of Paris bandage, which would accelerate the permanent stiffening of the knee, and said, "The sooner it is done the better." But the gentleman, before trying this application, and having a stiff knee for life, enclosed it to our Porous Plasters, and in less than two months his knee was perfectly cured.

PURE WATER.
Office of the DIAPHRAGM FILTER at MCKENZIE & CO.'S plumbing establishment, 35 West Fourth Street, corner of Green.
The Diaphragm Filter, as an invention, is regarded by the leading plumbers of this city, and generally by professional and scientific gentlemen, as the most simple, durable, and efficient apparatus for the purification of water under pressure. It has been awarded two gold and three silver medals by the American and Maryland Institutes and by the Massachusetts Mechanics Charitable Associations, and approved of by our most eminent chemists (with additional improvements).
The Diaphragm Filter, manufactured by ALEXANDER MCKENZIE, 305 Fourth St., is the kind of porous filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. IX.—No. 448.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

FOURTH OF JULY AT ALBANY AND SARATOGA.

THE fact that General GRANT was to be present at Albany on the Fourth rendered that place a great centre of attraction during that day.

The ceremonies of the day took place on the Washington Parade-Ground. Besides the Lieutenant-General, several other distinguished military men were present, among whom were Generals SCHOFIELD, HUNTER, KAUTZ, KILPATRICK, and DODGE. Having arrived on the Parade-Ground, after the prayer and the reading of the Declaration General BUTTERFIELD presented to the Government and people of New York two hundred battle-flags, accompanying the presentation with an eloquent speech. Governor FENTON was too weak to deliver the responsive address, which was read by his private secretary. The oration of the day was pronounced by Dr. E. H. CHAPIN. After the oration, which was one of CHAPIN's finest efforts, there was the usual rush after General GRANT, who with difficulty fought his way to his carriage. We give an illustration of the presentation of the flags on page 468.

Independence Day was celebrated at Saratoga also under brilliant auspices, being made the occasion for a grand reunion of the Army of Tennessee. The most noticeable characteristic of the celebration here was the absence of noise, the city government, frightened by the late fires, having forbidden the ignition of gunpowder in any shape during the day. The reunion of the army took place at LELAND's Union Hotel. Most of the officers who had been at Albany were present at the grand dinner which the LELANDS gave to the army. WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE recited a poem on the occasion. We give an illustration of the dinner on page 468. We publish also on page 469 three other illustrations—one of the ball which took place in the evening in the new Opera House just completed by the Messrs. LELANDS, another of the drive to Saratoga Lake, and the third gives a fine view of the Lake itself. Saratoga Lake is three and one half miles from the town, and has on its borders several hotels. Pickerel, perch, and other fish abound in the Lake, and the disciples of WALTON can here indulge to their heart's content in their favorite amusement. This Lake is the favorite resort of the visitors at the Springs, and is the terminus of the best drives about the town. On the Fourth these drives were frequented by a large number of fashionable turn-outs. It would not tend to diminish the pleasures of Independence Day if it were always and every where celebrated with the quietness which characterized the celebration this year at Saratoga.

PORTIA.—"Which is the Merchant here, and which the Jew?"—SHAKSPEARE.

THE GREAT LABOR QUESTION, FROM A SOUTHERN POINT OF VIEW.—[BY JOHN.]

SOLDIERS AT HOME.

THEY come through the green still ways
To their peaceful homes once more,
To lie in the shade through the summer days
Till their weariness is o'er,
And the silence grows a familiar thing
After the battle's roar.

They are strong in limb and look,
And forget to heed the rain;
And drink at every babbling brook,
And sleep on the open plain;
For the night-mists fall in harmless dew
On their oaken bark and grain.

The children count the scars
On their faces one by one;
And the maidens that twinkle out like stars
After the set of sun,
Draw shyly near to hear them tell
How the bloody fight was won.

They are heroes one and all
To these gentle ones they meet;
And the truest of love that to them call
Were never so soft and sweet;
And toward what once was a hopeless dream
They now may turn their feet.

They are a nation's pride,
And its living memory
Of the noble hearts that bravely died
Beside them on land and sea;
And at their feet are the highest gifts
Of a thankful people free.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

THERE seems to be a vague public impression that the Monroe doctrine is a restless fury that will not cease to hurry us until we warn France off the continent or drive her away. Mr. MONTGOMERY BLAIR, who is not a very wise man, denounces the Government for its servility to the French Emperor. Mr. HARLAN, the Secretary of the Interior, wishes that it might be the will of God that we should fight for Mexico. A great many other gentlemen also seem to suppose the country to be stepping about in a highly truculent mood, and, like the Irishman, requesting everybody for the love of Heaven to do him the favor of treading upon the tail of his coat. What then is the Monroe doctrine, and to what extent is it binding upon the United States Government?

The Monroe doctrine was an executive declaration never confirmed by Congress. It was made an instance of Mr. CANNING, the British Prime Minister, to meet a certain emergency, which was the suspected intention of the Holy Alliance to restore forcibly to Spain the American colonies which had revolted and had declared their independence. In the course of the message in which President MONROE alluded to the subject, he said that any European interposition to control the destiny of those colonies would be viewed as the sign of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. He also stated in another relation that "the American continents" were not to be henceforth considered subjects for European colonization.

This was a declaration which, as a specific measure under the existing circumstances, received the applause of the liberal party throughout the world, but as the assertion of a permanent national policy it was never adopted by Congress, was never allowed by foreign powers, and has never been the ground of any decisive national action. But it is now claimed to be a necessary tradition of our national conduct.

If it be meant by this claim that we are to regulate the internal condition of Mexico and all the other governments upon the North and South American continents, including Brazil, without any treaty with them or application from them, it is simple folly. If it be meant that we are to guard ourselves against evident peril, there is no need of giving a mysterious name to an inevitable and universal policy. Every nation has the right to defend itself against palpable danger. But to assume that the presence of any European power upon these "continents," without regard to the circumstances of the case, is menacing to this country is entirely gratuitous. Do we mean to declare that Mexico or Venezuela may not invite foreigners at their pleasure? And do we mean to decide for ourselves whether they have invited them or not? On the other hand, if the peril be held to lie not in the coming of Europeans, but in the monarchical form of government, do we mean that we will tolerate no monarchies upon the "continents?" In other words, does the Monroe doctrine mean that we will regulate all or any of the nations of North and South America exactly as we choose?

This is really the Monroe doctrine, as it is expounded in popular speeches and journals. The plea is, that our republican institutions are imperiled by the influence of a neighboring monarchy. But is republicanism such a puny system that its influence does not as seriously threaten monarchy? If we wished to see France fatally weakened, we could not more surely secure that result than by encouraging her to make Mexico a French colony. That is the clear perception of the shrewdest French statesmen. That is the instinct of the French people; and the Mexican expedition is, therefore, regarded as a truly imperial blunder. The truth is, that there is no European power that could colonize upon these continents without seriously injuring itself.

The Monroe doctrine, as it is popularly preached, is merely the infamous doctrine of the Ostend Manifesto—that we may do as we please with our neighbors, even to absorbing them. And this is logical. If we have a right to hold that a foreign government in Mexico is dangerous, we have an equal right to believe the same of a domestic government there. If, for our security, we may overthrow the one, we may destroy the other. All the high-wrung steps would be easy; and we naturally find that the advocates of "Manifest Destiny" and of filibustering are ardent friends of the Monroe doctrine. "It is clear that.... Cuba is as necessary to the North American republic," said JAMES BUCHANAN and his fellow-pirates at Ostend, "as any of its present members, and that it belongs naturally to that great family of States of which the Union is the providential nursery." The Ostend Manifesto is the oldest child of the Monroe doctrine.

When the people of the United States are convinced that their institutions are endangered by the condition of Cuba, or Yucatan, or Guatemala, or Caracas, or any other country upon these "continents," they will not hesitate to apply every necessary remedy. But no one believes they are alarmed by any thing that is now occurring; and we are very sure that, after the experience of the last four years, this country will not go to war upon an abstraction.

LETTING ALONE.

A FAMILIAR cry is heard from the unorganized States. It comes from orators and papers which have been heard before. "Just let us alone. That is all we want. As for the negroes we will manage them in any body else, and we must be permitted to manage them."

Except for the seriousness of the situation there could be something entirely humorous in this grave assertion. It is exactly what we have heard for the last twenty years. When it was perfectly evident that the slavery party was at every moment endangering the welfare of the country, a firm and vigorous protest was raised by sagacious citizens who did not mean to conserve, under any pretense whatever, the national ruin. Then came the answering shout from the party of slavery: "Let us alone. It is our affair. We know the negroes and understand how to manage them. Let us alone." And many honest minds were deceived by the appeal.

Then came secession. The men who had cried so lustily "Let us alone" while they were plotting, cried still more solemnly "Let us alone" when they were ready to consummate the crime. Their armed effort has been abortive but bloody. It is necessary for them to recur again to arts and intrigues, and so we hear the same cry, "Let us alone. Let us alone."

And who echo this cry? Those who in 1860 said that the Government had no right to coerce a State; those who in 1861 and 1862 said that the war was really occasioned by the loyal States, and that the Government ought to compromise with treason and disband the rebellion; those who in 1862 said that our erring sisters should be allowed to depart in peace. Those who in 1863 stimulated a counter-revolution, Governor Seymour in Chicago, and who declared the war a failure. Those who at the end of 1864 were politically annihilated by the American people at the polls.

What is the object of the cry? The overthrow of the Administration and the policy which directed the war, and the return to power of that alliance of Northern politicians and Southern followers which brought on the war. That alliance, we are told, secured peace to the country. Yes, it secured peace at the cost of national honor and by delaying a struggle which delay embittered a thousand-fold. It secured peace as a man secures solvency by paying fifty per cent. a day for money. It secured peace as he secured peace as he does who puts his nose into the fingers of a bully and obsequiously succumbs to his kicks. And what was the condition of him who broke it? When war began, who began it? Who justified those who began it? Who hoped and worked for their success? Those who now tell us that while they had the power they kept the peace. Those who we know when they lost the power broke the peace. They gave the country peace in a highwayman gives his victim life, on condition of obedience. "Just give us power again, fellow-citizens," they cry, "and you will see how we will keep the peace." Their fellow-citizens have already seen. Enough is as good as a feast.

The late rebels say that they know the negroes a great deal better than any body else. How have they proved it? By enslaving them with unparalleled barbarity. By outraging every human right and feeling. By making the Government, when the war came, every one of the people they "knew so well" instinctively turned against them, and hailed the enemies of their masters as, for that reason, their own best friends. A society which is so ignorant of human nature, of history, of divine justice, and of the laws of political economy as to suppose it can treat half of its members as brutes without danger to the general welfare, when its foolish assumption has ended in its own blood and ruin, might be held worthy of scorn or opinion if it does not feel it. There was never a class in the world which knew so little of another as the slaveholding class of the South knows of the slaves. Its ignorance has cost us a civil war; but it has also fortunately apprised us that such ignorance is a mortal peril.

And what can the slaveholding class now doing to show us how perfectly they understand the negroes? The Southern States are paralyzed. They can be reinvigorated only by labor. The negroes are the laboring population. They are native to the soil and the climate, and they are free. Common sense indicates the only policy. The inevitable facts of the case should be cordially accepted. Liberal wages should be paid. Honest contracts made. Just measures adopted to provide education and equal rights for the most substantial part of the population. In a word, the public prosperity should be secured and public peril avoided by the simplest and most obvious equity. But, instead of this, farmers are offering five dollars a month to freemen who, as slaves, could hire themselves and make fifteen or twenty. White people are gravely enacting that colored people shall not testify; shall not control their own children; shall not have a right to hold real vest; and are surrounding them with disabilities for which there would seem to be no legal redress. And all the while the class at the South which has made elaborate study a crime protests against the fearful ignorance of the colored people; and those who have disgraced labor and degraded the laborer, and who themselves never lifted a finger to work, now complain that the negro is a dreadfully lazy fellow, and will work only upon compulsion.

The truth is, the class which wished to be "let alone" in its assault upon the Union and Government, unchanged and unsubdued, now wishes to be "let alone" to reorganize itself upon its obsolete, inhuman, and dangerous prejudices and passions. It hates the Union; it hates free labor and freedom; it believes in its interpretation of the Constitution and in State sovereignty as much as ever. The spirit of this class is the cancer of the country. If the country wishes peace it will not let it alone.

THE PREMIUM ON GOLD.

GOLD continues rather to rise than fall. The sanguine people who expected to see it below 120 before midsummer have been disappointed. It is higher now than it was before JOHNSTON surrendered.

A number of theories have been set afloat to account for the firmness of the market. A fluctuation among a certain class of patriotic people is that the gold market is "cornered"—that a prominent operator in Exchange Place has bought up all the gold in market, and is in "carrying" it, as a speculation for the rise, obliging the Bears to pay as much as $\frac{1}{2}$ @ $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. a day for the use of gold for delivery. And this idea of the condition of the market is more than once during the past sixty days is notorious. But it is not the case now. Bailey and Secretary Fox's gold was abundant. Many holders were unable to lend their gold at all. Whatever effort may have been heretofore made by the Bulls in gold to put up the price by artificial scarcity, there is now no such effort at present. The advance in the premium is sustained by other causes.

Much is due to the Bulls, to the accumulation of $26,000,000 of gold in the Sub-treasury. More than half the specie in the city is locked up in the vaults of the Government, and the supply available for importers is thus largely reduced. This, when the duties average $400,000 a day, as at present, will of itself justify considerable firmness in the market. The banks have been parading for some time a specie average of about $20,000,000—last Monday it was $20,400,444—and it seems the State Bank, where the gold brokers keep their accounts, counts all the specie it holds, while other banks count certified checks on the State Bank as coin, the real amount probably not higher than $15,000,000. A drain of $1,000,000 a week upon this small fund will naturally tell, even in the absence of an export demand.

Appeals are daily made to Secretary M'CULLOCH to deplete the Sub-treasury of its gold. Two precedents light his path. His two predecessors, finding the effects of large accumulations of gold in the Sub-treasury, anticipated the payment of the coupons on the Five-Twenty Bonds. But the device failed. People did not want their money before it was due. In our market, bonds with one coupon short were difficult of sale; and foreigners would not remit their coupons before maturity. Less than ten per cent. of the anticipated coupons were presented for payment before the regular day. The other method of reducing the Treasury stock—an open sale of the gold—was tried by Mr. CHASE. Its effect was to produce a sudden stringency in the money market, a panic in stocks, and a large advance in the premium on gold. Then, as now, the revenue from customs so slightly exceeded the sum required for the payment of interest at the public debt that Wall Street speculated on the possible necessities of the Government, and foreseeing that Mr. CHASE might have to buy back the gold he had sold, took care that he should not get it back at a profit. The chances are that the operation would be followed by the same results now. With $26,000,000 of gold in hand, Mr. M'CULLOCH holds some sort of check on the speculators. If he lost his specie, he might, in the event of a sudden decrease of importations, find himself at their mercy. These considerations appear, thus far, to have counterbalanced, in the Secretary's mind, the reasons which dictated a depletion of the Treasury vaults.

So far as our foreign trade is concerned it does not at present justify an advance in gold. Notwithstanding large imports and light exports, we are shipping so many stocks and bonds to Europe that the balance of trade inclines in our favor, and bankers' exchange sells considerably below the equivalent of coin. Europe continues to absorb American securities with as much avidity as ever. Not only are Five-Twenties, Sixes, and Illinois Centrals sent out by every steamer, but a German demand has sprung up for Seven-Thirties, of which over a million go out on the average each week. At last accounts, at Frankfort, which is the chief European market for American securities, Seven-Thirties were quoted within one point of Five-Twenties. Even the English, who, led blindly by the London Times during the war, missed all the great bargains in Five-Twenties which have still further enriched opulent Amsterdam, are now beginning to try, at 70, bonds which they would not touch at 40 @ 45, and, in the language of one of their circulars, "the most active trades in our (London) markets are American securities." Unless, then, some accident occurs to check this European appetite for American stocks, the export of specie can not become large enough to affect the market—and so far as the influence of our foreign exchanges is concerned, the premium should rather decline than advance.

It is said that gold is going South for the purchase of cotton. It seems that in some localities at the South the planters prefer gold to greenbacks, even when the latter are offered at more than the current rate of depreciation. In South Carolina planters are reported to have preferred ten cents in gold to fifteen in greenbacks. But it will be found, on investigation, that very small amounts of coin have been withdrawn from our banks for Southern shores. Rumors are unsettled in that region for buyers to carry bags of gold about the country. And, really, after all that has been said about the movement of cotton, it is coming forward so slowly that we might pay for all we get in gold without disturbing the specie reserve of the banks.

The true cause, doubtless, of the steady advance in the premium on coin is the continued expansion of paper-money. The National Bank circulation continues to increase at the rate of $3,000,000 a week, or $500,000 a day. It is now $155,000,000, against $125,000,000 on 1st May. Of the addition of $30,000,000 current issues less in known, as the Secretary declined to furnish on 1st July the usual monthly statement of the public debt. But new legal tenders, bearing compound interest, dated in May and June last, have been seen, and it is known that, notwithstanding receipts of $2,000,000 a day from internal revenue and $5,000,000 a day from sales of Seven-Thirties, the public creditors are being paid three-fourths of their claims in debt certificates. The expansion takes every shape. Last week it was suggested to the Boston banks that they might lend their surplus funds on call to Government as the New York banks do. The proposals were at once forthcoming or promised. For this amount deposit certificates were issued, which were declared available for the Treasury loans. Thus at a stroke of the pen ten millions more fictitious capital was created, involving a corresponding expansion.

It can be nothing else than this continued creation of paper-money, in various shapes and under various names, which keeps gold so high. If there were a fair prospect of the return of low currency, merchants might look hopefully for a decline in the premium. But there is no indication that any thing of the kind is even remotely probable. Within a few months, nearly $750,000,000—a sum so enormous that the mind can scarcely grasp it—have been furnished to the Government by the people, and yet Mr. M'CULLOCH is said to be so short of money that he is compelled to pay three-fourths of his debts in debt certificates. Before 15th August the authority under which the Secretary is now borrowing money will expire. How will he pay his way till December? As soon as Congress meets a new loan bill will have to be passed. How will this fresh addition to our debt be viewed by people at home and our creditors abroad?

Large reductions in the army and navy have been made. The curtailment of the latter expecially has been prosecuted with the vigor which has throughout characterized that much abused but really most admirable functionary, Secretary WELLES. But a large army is still required—we are told—in the Southern States. Can not the cost of this army—which is the true source of our financial troubles, and the real secret of the firmness of gold—be made a subject upon the section which requires it?

REPORTING.

FROM the reports in the daily papers of the burning of BARNUM'S Museum it might be supposed that there was something peculiarly cordial in the death-agonies of helpless dumb creatures. The struggles of the poor animals in the fire are described as if they had been a spectacle of the purest hilarity and delight; and the details of suffering are elaborated with the zest with which we may imagine a cannibal contemplating the torture of his victim. It is certainly desirable to have the most accurate and circumstantial accounts of all interesting public events; but we submit to our friends of the daily press that the reportorial style should not add apparent inhumanity to rhetorical extravagance.

PEACE AND WAR.

JUDGE THOMPSON, of Philadelphia, and various other authorities private and public have decided that, as there are no organized armies in the field there was no authority of the Government, we are at peace. The closing of FORD'S theatre by a simple order of the Secretary of War is denounced by those who take this view as a most dangerous law at the liberties of the citizen in a time of peace. The trial of the murderers of the President by a military tribunal is a thing of which it was also vehemently condemned as an enormous crime against the public liberty. Are we at war? exclaim the indignant patriots. No, but we are not at peace.

If the fact of the disbanding of the great armies had restored us to a normal condition, the Government of the United States should at once withdraw its forces from the late insurgent States, and await such steps as those States might choose to take. But if it did that it would surrender to the States those forces to the action of those who have shown that they do not respect oaths, or to those who are practical proficients in Mr. RICHARD JOHNSON'S Perjury-made-easy.

A civil war, of course, has not end as a foreign war ends. It is the fierce outbreak of long-gathering political jealousies and hatreds. It has a fury and bitterness unknown to foreign wars: and it closes its active operations by the application upon one side of an overwhelming force which instantly converts the open hostility of the other into sullen opposition. This is now our condition, and it will long remain so. What hearty, cordial support of the Government, what love loyally to the Union have been developed in the recovered States? Virginia has been tolerably racked by the war, but the experiment of reinvestment fails in North Carolina, and it is estimated that an entire army corps will be necessary for the repose of the State.

If, then, we are not wholly at peace, the powers of war may be active so far as they are still necessary, and the Government must be the judge of that necessity. That in every instance it will decide wisely is improbable. Whether it must not be perilously prolonging the military organization—whether it may not plead military necessity too often, are proper matters of argument and warning. But you have no right to accuse it of wanton invasion of private rights—you have no right to say, as the Tribune does, that Mr. STANTON unjustly deprives Mr. FORD of the use of his property, unless you declare that the power itself, of which that is a special exercise, is illegal, upon the ground that war having ceased military necessity has ceased also. But upon what other plea are we occupying the late rebel States? And if military necessity exists at all, the Government must determine what it requires. The argument is precisely that of Mr. LINCOLN upon the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

The present danger to public liberty does not seem to us to lie in supposing that we are at war, but in supposing that we are entirely at peace. It is very desirable that we should not have our fine sense of freedom dulled by long submission to arbitrary power. It is of the utmost importance that extraordinary precedents should not be multiplied. But it is still more important that the Government of the United States should not fall into the bands of its enemies. And to that end the people who have vanquished those enemies in the field should justify the wise policy of military power until every satisfactory guaranty of public order has been obtained.

Against any mistaken act of such power we shall earnestly protest whenever we know the facts. Thus, as we understand it, the closing of FORD'S theatre was unwise, since if danger were apprehended it would, in our estimation, have been better to repress any riot by force than to prevent it by prohibiting a man from using his own property. But in a city where but three or four days previously the Government had suspended the privilege of the writ, it is clear that the military condition continues, and that, under it, the right of the Government to close the theatre exists. The Government may have known much that was unknown to others; and as it has not shown itself alarmingly despotic in its exercise of the arbitrary power which the Constitution confides to it in times of great public disorder, we have certainly no disposition to assail it now as if it were striking at the public liberty. The sense of liberty is not so easily destroyed as some of our friends seem to imagine; and the people who, to save liberty, have patiently borne with its occasional and necessary restriction during the four years will not justify an intemperate and ill-tempered denunciation of a faithful public officer who has stood so manfully and efficiently by them and their liberties.

THE ARGENTINE WAR.

OUR placid South American neighbors of the Argentine Republic suddenly find themselves at war with Paraguay. It would be more accurate to say that they are at war with LOPEZ, the tyrant of Paraguay. Paraguay is the estate of LOPEZ, which he inherited from his father, who received it from DR. FRANCIA the Dictator. The million inhabitant of Paraguay are the workmen of LOPEZ. He is the only merchant in the country, and every producer must sell to him at his rates under pain of death. And as this highly-protective system LOPEZ is naturally the richest man in Paraguay, which he keeps to himself as much as he can keeps the rest of the people poor.

Paraguay lies at the foot of the peninsula, formed by the rivers Paraguay and Parana, where they branch from the River de la Plata, as the Platte forks at the Nebraska line. LOPEZ, having some difficulty with Brazil, asked the Argentine Republic to allow him to march troops across their territory to attack Brazil. The Republic declined. But Brazil sailed up the River Plate to attack Paraguay. The Republic declared that it could not help it, but that Brazil had always been a friend. But LOPEZ resented what he chose to consider aid to his enemy, and notwithstanding a treaty which forbade the use of Argentine troops, he, before going to war, he has advanced an army into the territory of the Argentine Republic, which he has necessarily declared war, and which is now protecting an army of some forty thousand men, with a contingent of five thousand, from its little neighbor Uruguay, and some forty thousand from Brazil. It asserts that LOPEZ, and not only expel him from the country, but, as the Declaration says, overthrow his government, although the Republic emphatically disclaims all intention of annexing or subduing Paraguay.

Meanwhile LOPEZ, who did a shrewd man of affairs, and who has a standing army of seventy thousand men, has seized the first move and is ready for his enemies. Paraguay, as we said, may be figured as the letter L, the land assailed only along the rivers which bound it on each side; and just above the junction of those rivers, or the point of the V, LOPEZ has erected a very strong fort, stretching from bank to bank, and fully commanding both, which is garrisoned by ten thousand men, and commanded by the skilful Hungarian refugee MEZZAKA. It will be a very difficult task to dislodge him while he has his compact little country so well in hand; and our good Argentine friends are so fond of honorary commissions, that we do not anticipate a very speedy end of the war.

What does MR. MONTGOMERY BLAIR think that the Monroe doctrine demands of us in this state of things?

Those who are interested to know the present social and political condition and promise of the Argentine Republic will find clear and concise statement in a letter of M. LE SARMIENTO, the Argentine Minister in this country, lately addressed to MR. WILLIAM T. DAVISON, the Argentine Consul in New York.

BARNUM'S MUSEUM.

MUSIC has ceased forever in SCUDDER'S hallcony, not because of rain but of fire. When BARNUM'S Museum was burned, the days since of the few interesting, and from HALLECK'S lines we may say poetic, buildings in New York disappeared. The old Middle Dutch Mansion in Franklin Square, the house in which Citizen GENET married the daughter of Governor GEORGE CLINTON, and which was then a select boardinghouse, and the hotel at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets in which General WASHINGTON parted with his officers, are two of the most noted of the few buildings remaining in the city. They may, indeed, be accounted chief mourners at the departure of their sprightly and more juvenile companions, SCUDDER'S Museum.

There was no building so well known in the city, and no resort so permanently popular as BARNUM'S. It had all the characteristics of "a big show" in the very heart of the metropolis. It was the tent of the village green enlarged, and built in brick instead of canvas. Its music, its attractions, in which ladies and gents, in the strictest sense, popular. As a museum, the wax-work, the stuffed birds and animals, the curiosities collection, the wonderful two-headed calves and lambs, and the pictures, were much the same as in all museums. The menagerie was interesting. The theatre was "moral." The aquaria were truly beautiful and valuable. The temporary "star-attractions," the dwarfs, the Albinoes, the fat women and children, etc., were unfailing. But it was the combination of all, and the advertisement of some specialty, which made the charm.

By an unparalleled genius for advertising MR. BARNUM invented the queer old collection of trumpery and monsters with a kind of glamour. The Museum itself was a perpetual disappointment. It was very shabby. The visitor was haunted from the entrance with a conviction that he was humbugged. But his curiosity had been excited. Was the dwarf really so small? Was the mermaid actually a dried monkey with the tail of a sea cod? Was JOHN HEIR truly made of India rubber? These were questions that excited the popular mind. MR. BARNUM had the knack of making his wares the town talk, and the rest followed. The baby-shows, the dog-shows, the poultry-shows, were advertisements of the same kind. The merit was not in the things themselves, good as they were: it was in the manager, who could make people pay twenty-five cents to ascertain if the things had merit. And enormous attention and consequent profits increase by compound interest. The public was long ago persuaded that what BARNUM thought worth exhibiting was worth seeing—not for itself, but for what it might be thought so.

Besides, there was a certain quality in MR. BARNUM'S management which deserved success, and that was the personality of his invention. If he saw a poor colored idiot in the Bowery, he perceived at once that he could coin money by presenting him as an unknown man, or animal, or What-is-it from Central Africa. If FREMONT went upon an expedition to strange regions, why should not the Museum receive a strange animal from that region? Why not a woolly horse as well as any thing else? Doubtless, if the moon knew of MR. LOCKE had been devised among MR. BARNUM'S career, and a little more time could have been allowed before it was exposed, the American Museum would have contained specimens of "the brown quadrupeds living in the moon" and characteristics of the bison, but more diminutive than any species of the bos genus in our natural history;" and the sheet should have a distinct color about the size of a goat, with a head and beard like him, and a single horn slightly inclined forward from the perpendicular." Indeed, as it is, we have always understood that MR. BARNUM never had a specimen of that single horn. His public is generous and confiding. It would have taken the horn without question.

What man has done, the same man may do. MR. BARNUM is sure of the sympathy of the public and of the earnest desire to respond to his future efforts. In a new mission, under fairer auspices, let us count upon "wax figgers" even nobler than are gone; upon taller giants and smaller dwarfs, and a Museum, in short, more marvelous phœnix than any he ever exhibited, will rise resplendent from its own ashes. Already we perceive the untiring manager is twitching

"His nostrils thin,
To-morrow to fresh fields and pastures new."

LEFT-HANDED PENMANSHIP.

MR. WILLIAM OLAND BOURNE, the indefatigable editor of The Insurance Monitor, a neat, handsome, and interesting paper, issued every month, is always devising some fresh pleasure or benefit for the public. Some time ago he offered premiums amounting to five hundred dollars for the four best specimens of penmanship by "left-armed soldiers of the Union." Any man who has lost his right arm in the service may compete. He may write an original or selected article upon a patriotic theme, and he must write on both sides of one more than seven pages upon fine letter paper of ordinary size, leaving an inch margin at the sides, top, and bottom of the paper. The writer may also give his name in full; his regiment, company, and rank; the list of battles in which he has been engaged; how and where he lost his arm, and his post-office address. If enough specimens are forwarded they will be exhibited, and the premiums will probably be decided to the publication of a memorial volume containing the essays, with a list of the contributors; and a copy will be sent to each contributor. The manuscripts must be sent in on or before the 1st of October next, wrapped around a wooden roller; and MR. BOURNE avers that he will have the right of publishing such selections as he may choose.

The following are the Committee of Award: Governor FENTON of New York; Rev. DR. H. W. BELLOWS, President of the Sanitary Commission; WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT; GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS; and the Executive Committee of the Bureau of Employment at New York, HOWARD POTTER, WILLIAM E. DODGE, JUN., and THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY.

By order of the War Department of June 27 the limits of the new military divisions are thus defined:

First—The Military Division of the Atlantic, Major-General George G. Meade, with head-quarters at Philadelphia.

Second—The Military Division of the Mississippi, Major-General W. T. Sherman, with head-quarters at St. Louis.

Third—The Military Division of the Gulf, Major-General Philip H. Sheridan, with head-quarters at New Orleans.

Fourth—The Military Division of the Tennessee, Major-General George H. Thomas, with head-quarters at Nashville.

Fifth—The Military Division of the Pacific, Major-General H. W. Halleck, with head-quarters at San Francisco. These divisions are among the subdivided into eighteen military departments, each with a special command.

THE FREEDMEN.

Major-General O. O. Howard, Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, on the 12th of July issued a circular of general instruction to his subordinate officers throughout the South. The State Commissioners are to report to the Bureau, to assist them in the protection of the freedmen, the adjustment of rates of wages to be paid them by the planters, the establishment and management of schools for the education of the colored people, and the arrangements for supplying their needful needs. On these and various other matters monthly reports are to be rendered. It is particularly charged that no apprenticeship system or other substitute for slavery shall be tolerated. Suffering in any region, General Howard says, may result from this positive regulation, and suffering, he adds, is professional bravery, and is to some extent the necessary consequence of events.

THE WRECK OF THE "WILLIAM NELSON."

On the 26th of June the steamer of the ship Williams Nelson, on her way from Antwerp to New York, ordered all the passengers above, and the ship was thoroughly washed and fumigated. For the purpose of fumigating the vessel coals of fire were taken into the hold, and redhot irons thrown into it. The pitch ignited, boiled over, and set fire to the ship. The captain and other officers, with the cabin passengers, escaped in boats. The ship burned to the waterscape, carrying down four hundred steerage passengers. This disaster happened off the banks of Newfoundland.

SUNSET THOUGHTS.

WHEN we were at school together, Jack
There was down on neither's cheek!
Now!—if we look back along our track—
Which has gained what he would seek?
For the woman you loved is lying
In a church-yard far away,
And the sunset is swiftly dying,
Seems to you the best of the day.

My picture is in the Academy, Jack,
And they've hung it on the line;
And critics, good Jack, discern a knack
Sublime in this dash of mine.
But the eyes I dreamed should see it,
And the brow praise should be mine,
Have passed from the world. So be it.
But I live when the daylight dies.

For I see over roof and chimney, Jack,
The gold in the western sky.
Though the present's black as the stormy wrack
The hour of release drawn nigh.
For peace will rest when life is done—
Beyond the gloom lies the gold.
Oh, the sunset hour has for us a power
And a charm it lacked of old!

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE LAST MEET OF THE SEASON.

WHEN Mr. Trefalden arrived at Castletowers, at ten o'clock on Thursday morning, he was somewhat dismayed to find the courtyard crowded with carriages, the terrace full of ladies, and the open, lawn-like space in front of the house all alive with scarlet coats, horses, grooms, and hounds. Having walked across from the station by the field paths, he came upon the noisy scene all at once, and learned from half-a-dozen voices together that it was the last meet of the season.

Fully expecting to find his appointment forgotten, and Saxon among the riders, he passed on to the house, where the first person he met was Miss Cole, who, en amazone, with her riding-whip in her hand, and a drooping feather in her hat.

"Ah, Mr. Trefalden," she said, "we have just been talking of you. You will find none but enemies here."

"I trust that I am not to include Mademoiselle Colonna among that number."

"Of course not," she replied, with a smile that had some little mockery in it. "Is not Mr. Trefalden enrolled among the Friends of Italy? By-the-way, you have not yet seen yourself in our printed report for March. I have placed your name at the head of a column."

The hour bowed, and professed himself infinitely flattered.

"May I ask," said he, "why I am so unfortunate as to have provoked all this enmity to which you refer?"

"Because your presence deprives us of the pleasure of your cousin's society, and prevents him from putting on a scarlet coat, and distinguishing himself as a mighty hunter before the ladies."

"When he would infallibly have broken his neck," said Mr. Trefalden, drily.

"By-the-by, why did you not tell me he was your cousin that day we met at Reichenau?" asked Miss Cole, with provoking directness.

"I really can not tell—unless I supposed the fact could have no kind of interest for you."

"Or you were afraid I should want to enlist him also? But here is my steed."

"May I be permitted to mount you, Mademoiselle Colonna?"

"Many thanks," she said, as, having taken her tiny foot with the reverence of a devotee, Mr. Trefalden lifted her dexterously to the saddle and arranged the folds of her habit.

"I had really no idea, Mr. Trefalden, that you, a devotee of mammon in the law, were also an accomplished cavalier."

"Why not, Signora?"

"Indeed, I can hardly say; but I should as soon have thought of exacting escort duty from the Archbishop of Canterbury. But, see, your friend is here without his foe or six other gentlemen. Seeing Mademoiselle Colonna already in the saddle he bit his lip, and said, with unconcealed disappointment:

"Has Vaughan again anticipated me in my office?"

The proud blood rose to Olimpia's cheek.

"If, sir, you think a lady whose hours are at the door is, I believe, the office of whatever gentleman may be at hand, Lord Castletowers," she replied, haughtily. "Mr. Trefalden was so obliging as to mount me this morning."

The Earl turned, in some confusion, and shook hands with his lawyer.

"I beg your pardon, Trefalden," he said, hastily. "I had not observed you. Won't you take a run with us? Ah no—I forgot. You are here to-day on business; but we shall meet at dinner. You will find your cousin in the dining-room."

And with this he sprang upon his black mare, reined up beside Mademoiselle Colonna, and began speaking in a low earnest tone that was audible to her alone. The lady answered him briefly, bade Mr. Trefalden a courteous good-morning, and rode swiftly out of the court-yard, followed by the red-coats as by a guard of honor. Mr. Trefalden looked after them, and smiled thoughtfully.

"Poor Castletowers!" said he to himself. "She has no heart for any thing but Italy."

And he went into the house, where he found the breakfast over, the dining-room deserted, and every body out with the meeting. It was a large assembly, consisting chiefly of ladies, and the general interest was at that moment centred in a young gentleman who was riding down the way down the green slope and through the checkered shade of the oaks.

When that gleam of scarlet had disappeared Mr. Trefalden went up to Saxon, who was standing somewhat dolefully apart from the rest, laid his hand upon his shoulder, and said:

"Why so dull and mute, young sinner? Is it so hard a fate to stay indoors and read through a bagful of money documents when others are breaking their necks over five-barred gates?"

Saxon turned with his frank smile and grasped his cousin's hand.

"It did seem hard a minute ago," replied he; "but not that you are come. I don't care any longer. Castletowers said we were to go into the library."

"Then we will go at once, and get our business over. I hope your brains are in good order for such work this morning, Saxon."

But Saxon laughed, and shook his head doubtfully.

"You must be my brains in matters of this kind, cousin William," said he. "I understand nothing about money, except how to spend it."

"True, my boy. That is the only use than I gave you credit for," replied Mr. Trefalden. "Money is a very pleasant and desirable thing, but there are few people who are born connected with it—how to get it, how to keep it, and how to spend it—and I am not at all sure that to do the last is the best way to make the most of it of the three. My business with you to-day, however, concerns the second of those propositions. I want to show you how much you have money for I fear there are only too many who enjoy teaching you the way to spend it."

They had now reached the library, a long low room, paneled and furnished with dark oak, and looking out upon the same quiet garden that was commanded by the widow of Signor Colonna's little study. The recesses at each side of the bay-window, and the whole length of the opposite wall, were fitted with shelves protected at the edges by strips of stamped and gilded leather. These shelves were filled with works, county histories, chronologies, sermons, dictionaries, peerages, and parliamentary records. Here and there in the midst of British essayists, or a few modern books in covers of bright cloth, broke the ponderous monotony but the Castletowers collection, as chiefly made up of those works which it is said no gentleman's library should be without, was but a dull affair upon the whole, and attracted few readers. A stag's skull and antlers presided spectrally above the door, and an elaborate genealogical tree of the Castletowers family, heavily framed in old black oak, hung over the mantelpiece like a hatchment.

"Sit down, William," said Saxon, with an anticipative yawn, "where is the bag of parchments?"

But Mr. Trefalden laid only his pocket-book and a small case-map on the table before him.

"The bag," he replied, "is not but a figure of speech, a legal fiction. I have no parchments whatever to inflict upon you—nothing but a few columns of figures, a letter or two, and a map of Western Asia."

Saxon opened his eyes.

"What in the world have I to do with Western Asia?" said he.

"That is just what I am here to tell you."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE NEW OVERLAND ROUTE.

"IN the first place, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, "I dare say you have guessed, I suppose, I would never have thought of doing you a service! I have had your account made up at Drummond's, and confess that the result has somewhat surprised me."

"Why so?"

"Well in part because you have spent a great deal of money in a very short time, for I anticipated that; but because so many of your checks appear to have been drawn in favor of your friends. Here, for instance, is the name of Sir Charles Burgoyne—a name which recurs no fewer than fourteen times within the space of five weeks. The first entry is for five hundred and twenty-five pounds; date, the twenty-first of March."

"That was for the mare and cab," said Saxon, quickly. "I was his own favorite mare, and so he let me have her. He had been offered five hundred and fifty only a day or two before."

Mr. Trefalden smiled incredulously, and glanced back at a memorandum entered in his note-book a few weeks before when sitting behind that morning paper in a window of the Erechtheum club-house. The memorandum told a different tale. He contented himself, however, with repeating the words "mare and cab" against the sum, and then went on.

"Second check—six hundred and ten pounds; date, the twenty-ninth of March."

"My two riding-horses and their equipments," explained Saxon.

"Humph! and were these also Sir Charles Burgoyne's favorites?"

"No, not at all. He was kind enough to buy them for me from a friend who was reducing his establishment."

Mr. Trefalden checked off the six hundred and ten pounds as before.

"Third check—two thousand pounds; date, the first day of March."

"Oh, that's nothing," said Saxon. "That's not spent—it's only borrowed."

"Of Sir Charles Burgoyne?"

"Yes."

"And the next, for two thousand five hundred, dated April the third?"

"I—I rather think that's borrowed also," replied Saxon.

"Then come various smaller checks—four hundred, two hundred and fifteen, fifty-seven, one hundred and five, and so forth; and by-and-by another heavy sum—one thousand and fifty pounds. Do you remember what that was for?"

"Yes, to be sure; that was the thousand guineas for the mail phaeton and pair; and even Castletowers said it was not dear."

Mr. Trefalden turned to another page of his note-book.

"It seems to me," observed he, "that Lord Castletowers is the only young man of your acquaintance whose friendship has not been testified in some kind of pecuniary transaction. Here, then, is the Honorable Edward Brandon. Has he also been generously depopulating his stables in your favor?"

Saxon laughed and shook his head.

"I should think not, indeed!" said he. "Poor Brandon has nothing to sell. He does not own a horse now and then when he has a sovereign to spare—and that is seldom enough."

"What, then, was translated, meant, I presume, that the two thousand and odd pounds paid over at different times to Mr. Brandon are simply loans?"

"Just so."

"And Gus Greville, Esquire—who is he?"

"One of our Erechtheum nuts; but that's a mere trifle."

"You call two hundred and fifty pounds a mere trifle? Then Patrick Fitz Hugh, Esquire—four hundred pounds. Is he another member of your club?"

"Yes, a very pleasant fellow, an Irishman."

"Both loans, of course?"

Saxon nodded.

"Then came a number of miscellaneous checks, evidently payments to tradesmen—one, I see, for fifteen hundred to Hunt and Roskell. How much of that went for the prima donna's bracelet, you young rogue?"

"I never saw the least idea. Gillingwater takes care of the bills."

"There is another little item that must not be forgotten, Saxon," he went on; "namely, that trifle of fifty-nine thousand pounds to one Lawrence Greatorex."

"That is not spent, but deposited," said Saxon, sagely.

"Exactly so, and which might have been deposited to your advantage in the name of Vesuvius. But enough of details. Have you any notion of what the sum total amounts to?"

"None whatever."

"What do you say to seventy-eight thousand six hundred and twelve pounds?"

"I am sorry to hear it," replied Saxon, "but the trifle of fifty-nine thousand pounds to one Lawrence Greatorex—" most direct course to Palmyra, whence it follows the valley of the Euphrates, and comes out upon the Persian Gulf at the point where the united waters of the Euphrates and Tigris empty themselves into the sea, one hundred and thirty miles below Korna."

"And then it goes straight down the Persian Gulf and over to Bombay," said Saxon.

Mr. Trefalden looked up with his finger on the map.

"If," said he, "its line from Sidon to the sea represented a fine railway, in connection with a first-class steam-packet service at either extremity, which route to India do you think you would prefer?"

"This, of course. No man in his senses could do otherwise. The distance, to begin with, must be much less?"

"About twelve or fourteen hundred miles."

"And then there would be far more of the journey performed by land—and through what a land! Palmyra—the plains of Babylon—Bassora— By-love! One would make the journey to India for the mere sake of visiting places so famous in the history of the ancient world!"

"I confess that I regard this project from a less sentimental point of view," replied Mr. Trefalden. "Now hear the practical side of it; and understand that I am giving you only approximate facts—facts in the rough, before they have been squared and smoothed by surveyors and accountants. We calculate that this line of railway will travel over about seven hundred and fifty, or eight hundred miles; that is to say, it will exceed the line now laid down between Calais and Toulon by not more than a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles. It will unquestionably draw to itself the whole merchant traffic of India, China, Persia, and Ceylon. It will be the nearest route to Australia, and it will bring Bombay within twelve or fourteen days of London."

"It takes one's breath away!" said Saxon.

Mr. Trefalden smiled, a smile of quiet triumph.

"But this is not all," said he. "We have reason to believe that at Hit, where there are mineral springs, we shall find coal; and as Hit lies very nearly half-way between Sidon and the Gulf, we shall be enabled to supply steam-service at both shores, and our whole line of railway from one central source."

"Those must be the bituminous fountains mentioned by Herodotus," said Saxon, quickly; "the fountains of Is that supplied asphalte for cementing the walls of Babylon?"

"If possible, Saxon, oblige me by confining your attention to the nineteenth century," expostulated the lawyer. "Try to think of Babylon as a railway station, and of Palmyra as a place where the royal allows travellers coffee for refreshments. Yes—I knew that would appall you. Now, perhaps you will give me your opinion of the Overland Route."

"My opinion!" repeated Saxon. "You might as well ask my opinion of the geology of Uranus!"

"That is the very consideration which deters me from recommending it to you as an investment."

"Oh, you need not let it do that," laughed Saxon. "I am as ignorant of one business matter as another. Be told you just now that you must be my brains, whenever money came in question!"

But what makes it still more difficult is, that in this case I may not let you benefit by any other person's brains," replied Mr. Trefalden.

"There are interests to be combated in the promotion of such a scheme as this; and it is of importance that we keep it, for the present, profoundly secret. Whether you interest yourself in it or not, I must bind you over, Saxon, to breathe no word of this matter to any living ear."

Saxon gave the promise unhesitatingly, but did not understand why it should be necessary.

"Because we must not rouse opposition before our system is matured," explained Mr. Trefalden.

"But if the new route is so great an improvement," urged Saxon, "who would oppose it?"

"All those persons who are interested in the old one," replied his cousin, smiling. "The Peninsular and Oriental Steam-packet Company —the shareholders and directors of the Red Sea Railway—the forty thousand English who colonize Alexandria."

"And would all those persons be ruined?"

"Every reformation ruins somebody," observed Mr. Trefalden, philosophically.

"Yes, but the reformer is bound to balance present evil against future good. Would the future good, in this case, outweigh the present evil?"

"Unquestionably."

"Is it large?"

Mr. Trefalden was momentarily puzzled. He had contemplated this subject from all sides except the one presented to him. Saxon's benevolent point of view had never occurred to him.

"Well," he suggested, "it will give employment to [illegible]."

"But it will throw thousands out of employment."

"—It will promote commerce, extend the boundaries of civilization, improve Arabia—"

"I wonder if, by such forty thousand English for the sake of improving Arabia," interrupted Saxon, hastily.

"—and bring the shores of England and Hindostan so near that, were another mutiny to break out, we could land our troops at Bombay within twelve days after receiving the intelligence. The value of that possibility alone is incalculable."

"That is true; but—"

"And of our absolute success," continued Mr. Trefalden, "there can be no kind of doubt. I have been almost unwilling, Saxon, to embark you in an enterprise the advantages of which, however obvious to practical men, are not open to immediate test; but it is my duty to tell you that I have never known so brilliant an opening for the employment of capital."

"But—"

"Seven and a half per cent is merely the rate of interest offered by the company. The profits of the railway will be enormous. The moment it is completed the returns will be enormous. Your seven and a half per cent, my dear fellow, will become twenty-five, perhaps fifty."

"I don't want twenty-five, or fifty," replied Saxon. "I have more money now than I know what to do with."

"I am sure you will always make good use of whatever wealth you possess," said Mr. Trefalden.

"And it would break my heart to injure all those who live by the present route. Why, for instance, should I desire to ruin the Peninsular and Oriental Steam-packet Company?"

"We hope to do no such thing," said Mr. Trefalden. "We shall propose a coalition, and probably employ the very same vessels."

"And then the English colony at Alexandria!"

"Sidon will become what Alexandria is now —our rather than a far more important place than Alexandria has ever been since the days of her ancient prosperity. Just as now the empire has its palaces, villas, quays, and churches at Alexandria, we shall then require them at Sidon. The Alexandrian consulates are removed, and entre-pont; they will simply remove to the new port, and in ten years' time will be richer than if they had remained where they were."

"Do you really think so?"

"I do think it; I know it. And the Suez Railway Company will fare no worse than the rest. We shall in all probability take their whole body of debt into our hands, and incorporate the shareholders' interests with our own. But the fact is, Saxon, you know too little of life to be able to judge a question of this kind; and I see you do not take kindly to the idea, so we will say no more about it."

"I could not bear home to do harm," said Saxon; "but now that you explain the matter so fully, I am quite willing—"

"But Mr. Trefalden would not hear of it.

"No, no," he said, coldly, gathering up his papers and folding his map. "I was anxious to do all that was possible for your interests; but it is, perhaps, better that you have nothing to say to the New Route."

"Yet, if you think well of it—"

"I think so well of it, that I am about to invest all I possess in the company's shares; but that need not influence you. In point of fact, Saxon, I would rather leave your money in the funds. You will get only three per cent, but then you can re-invest when you please, and the responsibility of advising you will be mine no longer."

"You are vexed with me, cousin William!"

"I regret that you think me capable of advising you to do what is wrong," said Mr. Trefalden. Mr. Trefalden, somewhat stiffly.

"But I think nothing of the kind. I was in error just now; but, as you said only a moment before, I know nothing of life, so pray do not hold me accountable for the sins of my ignorance."

"Tush! not another word," said the lawyer, kindly. "You have said more than enough."

"And the investment?"

"With regard to the investment, I detest the main share principle, and I look for me to leave your money in government stock, at three per cent. Even so it will bring you one hundred and thirty-five thousand per annum."

"As you please. It will be less trouble to spend, and make me quite so happy!"

Mr. Trefalden looked at his watch.

"It will also leave you with less to give, and less power to make others happy," said he.

The cashier's clock struck the half-hour.

"I wish I knew what I ought to do!" he exclaimed, with an impatient sigh. "What do you really think, cousin William?"

"I had rather not say more than I have already said," replied Mr. Trefalden. "You have had my advice."

"So I have—and of course I ought to follow it. You will refuse to help me, then?"

"Certainly not. You need only make your decision, and give me your instructions."

"I have made it," said Saxon, firmly, by all means, and let there be an end of it."

"And how do you wish me to invest it, Saxon?" asked Mr. Trefalden, with his pen in the ink.

"In the New Route, of course."

"In the unlimited number of shares, in the New Overland-Route-Steam-Packet and Railway-Company, Limited," said the lawyer, scribbling rapidly. "Is that your decision?"

"To whatever amount you think proper."

"Shall we say to the extent of two millions?"

"Why only two? What is to be done with the rest?"

Mr. Trefalden stooped over his writing, and a keen observer might have seen that he changed color.

"I do not recommend you," he said, "to invest more at present. As it is, you will be the largest shareholder on the list; and by-and-by, if the company should see fit to raise further capital, you can purchase additional shares. I must trouble you to sign this paper, Saxon—it is a power of attorney, which gives me authority to sell out your two millions."

The cashier followed Mr. Trefalden's pen and scrawled his name as carelessly as if he were signing away a couple of pounds.

"You ought never to subscribe your name to a paper without reading it," said Mr. Trefalden. "Remember that. By-the-way, Saxon, I shall see that you are entered as a director."

"As a director, if you please, then, who is not expected to do any thing," replied Saxon, laughing. "But are you also a director?"

"No; I am only solicitor to the company. But now that the business is settled, would you not like to glance over these tables of estimates? Here, you see, is a plan of the route, and here the probable cost of the works, including—"

"I beg your pardon, cousin William," interrupted Saxon, "but if our business is settled, I prefer not looking at figures. Will you tell me about the route. For pity's sake let us go out and forget all about it!"

"I fear," said Mr. Trefalden, "that you are utterly incorrigible."

"I know I am. Do you ride?"

"Yes, now and then."

"Then we will go in search of the hunting-party."

So Mr. Trefalden put his tables of estimates back into his pocket-book, and business was banished beyond recall. Then they went round to the stables, and Saxon ordered out his two thorough-breds.

The trust must have not forgotten what I said to you at Reichenau on the subject of fetters, Saxon," said Mr. Trefalden, as they cantered presently over the level road to Maidenhead. "Success is a dangerous neighbor. Beware of her."

Saxon laughed gayly.

"Fear nothing on my account, cousin William," said he. "I have the advantage of Achilles—there isn't a vulnerable point about me."

"We are all apt to think so till the arrow finds us out. Remember, I shall solicit your support, you will confine yourself to a money contribution, and pledge yourself to nothing foolish."

"Of course not; but what else could I pledge myself to?"

"Heaven knows! She is capable of asking you to take the command of a troop."

THE DEATH-BED OF A SCOTCH FARMER.—The old man, on his death-bed, called his son to his bedside. "I'm glad to see ye, dearlie," he said, well without opening his eyes. "I'm glad to see ye, for I'm sure I'll no be here to gie ye better as I was but like to hae myself, gin it had pleased the Lord. Now, I'm sure, I'll no recover, for I feel I'll no care o' his sair."—Here his mind began to wander again.

"Morgie," he said, "is my son steekit, for I think I see angels [—An ye are very close indeed.—Well, that's a' we can do. Morgie, ye'll no forget to feed the mare at noon. Then he reverted to the fancy that Annie was the first woman in the company who was sick, and she was nursed, brokenly, 'Whan ye tak it up, be carefu' hoo ye haud it, for the pain's unco weyk, and the'll no be very clean, and mickel blood the bonnie white hain's o' God's weyes are wayrld, I fear, but there's an awfu' sicht the nicht o' 't, while cam' in an ill word I gied a bairn for brealin' a nest. He can not be called an honest man who speaks with an interest in a subject of which he knows less than he does rigbt. Simplicity and honesty of purpose will detain him, in the midst of his most necessary knowledge has been acquired; and he will in the former case close his lips until he has fully matured his ideas, as it is very unlikely which causes men to hazard opinions, as if they were consoling their self-esteem by uttering truths. It is vanity which makes them controvert such other's statements; and it is a vain man who is ever in a hurry, and is a confession that their words have not the weight and "ring" of true coin. It is the encouragement of silence. It suggests or acts argue about the position of a shoal or a quicksand, for they are the best of unconscious teachers; and those whom no earnest purpose drives on to act. It is man has a truth to communicate, he is comparatively slow. He hesitates either know that it is true, and accept it; or else they do not know it is very foolish. An earnest man in such a case investigates; he seeks knowledge, and zeroes to be certain. Such a man makes a false statement, and it is at once rejected as false, or else disproved after investigation. Such a man is slow to form opinions. For when an earnest man hears an assertion he sifts it until he gets to the bottom of it. Persons' assertions are like weeds in putting the thing clearly before him. Then he is ready to judge if it is a mere fabrication of the brain. Many seen are the schools of other's sayings. The opinion which they entertain is not at all based upon any which it fastened an idle curiosity to hear, it gratifies their egotistic vanity to express it. Such a character can not be questioned to any profit. His meaning can not be drawn out by any skillful inquiry as what he says, and the import of one of his words, and you will find that there is no usage in his mind to which it is due.

A PIG WITH A WOODEN LEG.—A tailor in Coupar-Angus who had a pig which got one of its legs broken, has replaced the injured member by a wooden one. It is curious to see the animal hobbling about, but it is thriving as well as before the accident.

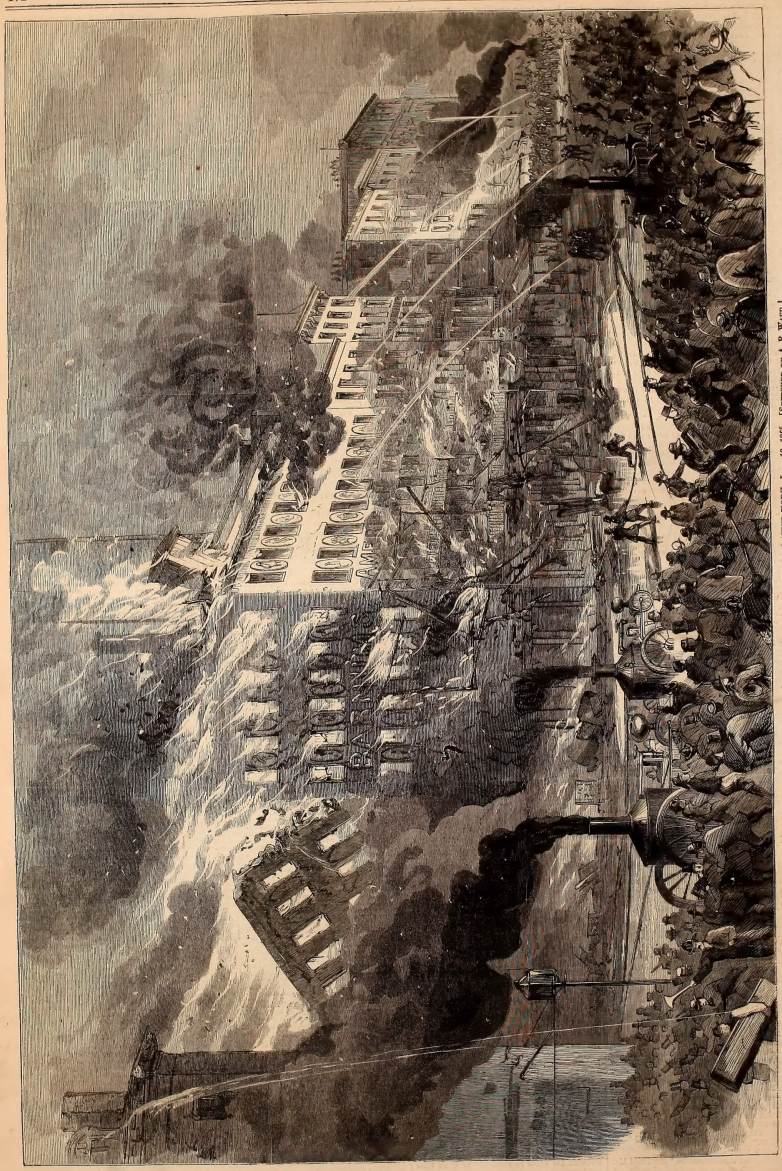
"MARRIED FOR MONEY!"—Every atom of the long procession that now crowds the thoroughfares of life should bear words. Autumn leaves, indeed! Can that weird wind and sober robes of virgin white—of youthful, fresh, and untilled soil, which the mockery of death in the form of a bridegroom that the handsome young craven, who has been tempted by the golden opportunity to wed the fair and tender rose, marries her for her money, and loathes her in his soul? Impossible! And yet, with the hideous beauty of a woman who has not learned that most difficult of all things, how to be old gracefully, she effects to regard as something other and beyond the purely mercantile transaction which in reality it is. As he stands there perjuring himself, and while she grins horribly a smile that she must mistake for love, in the secret heart which had once warmed to the smile of another—ay, that even yet has power to warm—there is a sensation akin to that which her two has our deeper contempt, the man who has sold himself, or the woman who has bought him. But as we can not satisfactorily settle the question, we leave it undetermined, and come out from the opp-osite presence of those who are, with vows before God, contracting a perjured and unholy bargain.

EMIGRATION FROM THE CONTINENT.—An article from a Swedish paper contains a great deal of interesting matter concerning emigration from the Continent in this century. From Germany, between 1840 and 1860, there departed in other lands 1,846,000, nearly all of whom went to America; from Scandinavia, between 1840 and 1865, 240,000 of her citizens, who went to transatlantic countries; in the forty years between 1820 and 1860 less than 200,000 Swedes emigrated to countries on the other side of the Atlantic, between 1851 and 1860 there emigrated from Norway 20,000. North Jutland in Sleben elected 27,000 emigrants from Hamburg and Spain. In the short period of three years more than 35,000 Poles became took up their residence in Brazil; whereas not more than 1,000 had emigrated previously to 1850, and scarcely any to Brazil, including 1850. Of Belgians there left between 1851 and 1865, 100,000, and 50,000 between 1861 and 1865 inclusive 30,000. How many Swiss have quitted their native country is not known with any ascertaining, but in the decade from 1850 to 1860 there were supplied with passports between 100 and 1860 visas from Denmark, from 1850 to 1860, the number of emigrants of German origin was the greater part went to the Morocco.

The poor old old times the kings and queens of England have been auditors in, or managers of, the love-affairs of their subjects. The kings were chiefly managers, in the sense that they were grandfies of marriage-table intrigue, and the queens were auditors to evil at rather easier prices. The queens were of more womanly purpose: there was Henry the Eighth's Anne Boleyn, and there was one with Margaret of Anjou, in her few happy and unbroided days. They for believe written by Monsieur are counted, but for this there is good reason. The York government made the mistake of not keeping a capital diary, and then the queen's letters were destroyed by their timid owners. Since few statesmen in all ages have been a bolder spirit have been discovered, and recently published by the Camden Society, Cecil's love-letters remarkably passed down are those which relate to the love-affairs of some of her household's nobility. These letter are not all sparkle and awaine of high degree; some among them are lowly, indeed, and concern the marriages of the humble people, who implore the queen's good offices in their behalf. Such royal service could not have been hopefully rewarded. Margaret had a high reverence for the honorable estate of matrimony, and from her earliest days she exerted herself to stave reluctant to plied consent, to great presumption to all in forthering the objects of her own group, and one and thus to a coy maiden dallying with "yes," not with "nay to say." And altogether intelligent people can her manly vocey, she has—as she is told—her fair person to worship, and divine beauties in reverence.

A CHURCH bell has been ordered at Troy for Great Salt Lake City. They say it is to call Brigham Young's wives together. Brigham thinks his self-importance is about hundred and sixty-five ladies (one for each day in the calendar).

GOLDEN HAIR.—The Countess de Castiglione was remarkable for the beautiful color of her hair. Golden hair of a shade has been glittered on the head of Lucretia Borgia now the quickly among the descendants of the Visconti. Lord Byron's Harlot Pary's hair was of this rare and splendid hue: Miss Brickbridge, the celebrated actress, takes from her golden head, after she had lain in her grave for more than two hundred years, described as exactly resembling the hair of Sardanapalus's gold; and singularly enough the daughter of Catherine de Medici, who was also remarkable for golden hair—died in undoubtedly was, for, some half dozen years ago, a lock of the queen's golden hair was discovered in a copy of Sidney's Arcadia at Wilton. It has been presented to the author of this article, and consists of a small, soft, silky, and wavy, of a beautiful golden brown color, without a trace of red, and still shining as though powdered with gold-dust.



ADVANTAGES OF CLOTHING.—A journeyman butler, a native of Sweden, in Berlin, on receiving his certificate for himself, was anxious to get a handsome sign-board, with a suitable inscription. He accordingly applied to a painter. "John Thompson, butler, makes and sells hats for ready money," was the inscription that was painted. The husband he would submit it to his friends for amendments. The next day he went to get the board, and the inscription ran, because followed by the words "makes hats," which showed he was a butler; it was not worth while. It next observed that the word "makes" might as well be omitted, because the customer would not come to him for the hats; if good, and to their mind, they would buy, by whomsoever made. He thought that old was also superfluous, and he thought that the words "for ready money" were needless, for he was not going to give credit. He now looked over every one who purchased expected to pay. There, too, were the words "sells hats," which he had no doubt of. Thompson sells hats." "Sells hats!" says his next friend: "why, who would expect you to give hats away?" "Then, what's the use of the word?" It was struck out, and hats was altered to clothing. Then it read, "John Thompson, clothing." Even this inscription, first of it was, was reduced still more to "John Thompson," and the board was left for the subjoined.

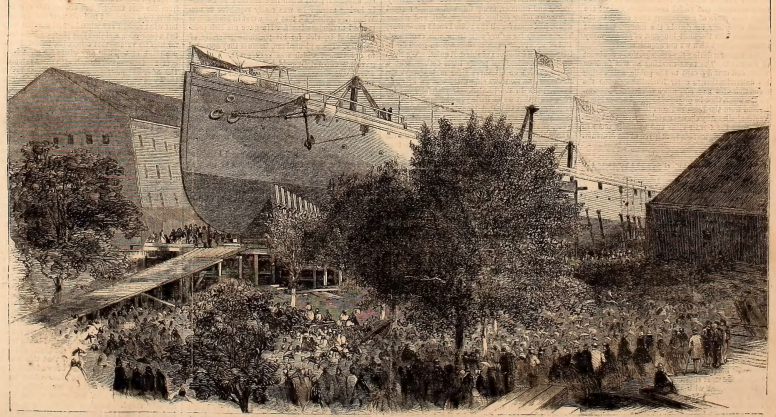
It is a remarkable fact that electricity travels so rapidly that it may be sent through gunpowder without igniting it. A train of powder was laid across the entrance to a tunnel, and the explosion took place. The progress of electricity is swifter than that of light, being about two hundred miles a second.

HOME EDUCATION CONGRESS WITH PUBLIC EDUCATION.—Happily, however, of all if not of all, the best place in whom the advantages of school instruction are combined with the blessings of home education, is found. It is a pertinent inquiry that he can delegate altogether the office which God has himself instituted him, signally of the duties, and retaining its endearments. God has charged him with the responsibility, and will require the account. It matters not how perfect the discipline, how sound the instruction, by which the love of parents can be compensated. These things can not give that train which they constantly effect; nonetheless, that which is something something lofty and admirable, fruitful in practical talents and in manly virtues. Nothing but they can not secure a powerful love such as it ought to be, nor a parents' care such as it ought to be, for the child of his children. It is with, therefore, when the latter are not wholly exchanged for the former—when the influence of home is not wholly suspended, but remains, as it were, in the back-ground, to exert a softening and humanizing power over what is otherwise severe.

THE SEWING SCHOOL.—It is said that a mad-stone, in the possession of Sister Elizabeth, formerly of the Gotham the school in Lebanon, now of Watervliet, has cured fifty persons who had been bitten by mad dogs. The stone sets as a leech, and, applied to the wound, extracts all the poison.

TOO SAFE!—Alas! how many hearts have ceased to beat with the wild pulsation of hope when those cruel, crushing words have fallen on the ear, leaving only the utter blankness of despair! How often have the struggles of love-weary years realized a fortune for life! How often we have all found what we coveted most, money, power, love—but too late! How madly happy it would have been could we have given our heart and hand before our spirit broken! It sickens us now, for we loved given up to the struggle and torn from it, and the wasted of dying beggar torne from food, the want of which has killed him.

THE DESTRUCTION BY FIRE OF BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM, IN NEW YORK, JULY 13, 1865.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]



RUINS OF BARNUM'S AMERICAN MUSEUM AS SEEN THE MORNING AFTER THE FIRE.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.]

BURNING OF BARNUM'S MUSEUM.

THOUGH not the oldest, yet certainly the most notable of the landmarks of our city, has been removed by fire. Last winter, it will be remembered, there was an attempt made by a rebel spy to set fire to BARNUM'S American Museum, on the corner of Park Row and ANN Street. What the plot of the incendiary failed to do accident has successfully accomplished, and the Museum lies in ashes.

The fire broke out in the basement, from the contact of the heated boiler of the engine with dry wood, at about half after 12 o'clock on Thursday, July 13. The hour for such a catastrophe could not have been more ilfly chosen. There were comparatively few persons in the Museum, and these all escaped without injury. Very little of the property in the Museum was rescued—the live seal, a box of rare coins, and a few things of trivial value, were all, we believe, that was saved. In half an hour after the outbreak of the fire the whole building was in flames; and the long serpent tongues of fire pierced the windows, and, lapping the transparencies and painted shields upon the walls, ascended high above the roof. The spectacle was one of the most splendid which we ever beheld. There were many valuable trophies consumed upon this massive funeral pyre. There were full uniforms worn by the heroes of the Revolution, the tools and specimens of the handiwork of the American Indian, specimens of the mineral and animal kingdoms, brought from every quarter of the world, and among these the most beautiful collection of tropical fishes ever got together. There, too, was the Egyptian mummy, which had defied decay for three thousand years, but was now compelled to yield to the element of fire. Those things could not be reproduced, and were therefore invaluable. Other curiosities like the wax-figures could easily be replaced. The two men who exhibit Barnum's Baby had just returned from Labrador at great cost were reunited, alive, as were all the members of the Happy Family.

As soon as it became known that Barnum's Museum was on fire thousands of eager and excited spectators—men, women, and children, some of whom were at the breast—rushed to the scene of the fire. They were densely packed together in the Park, and in front of St. Paul's Church and the Astor House, and gazed with eyes intent upon the gigantic building which some unearthly genius seemed to be playing upon the veteran showman, whose name has become a household word. A panic occurred among these spectators at an early stage of the fire, caused by the unearthly scream of one of the steam fire-engines, which was magnified into an occasion of fear. The rush for a few minutes was very violent, though no fatal injuries resulted.

At half past two o'clock the walls of the Museum had fallen and the fire had spread to a large number of the adjacent buildings. These were just enough wind stirring to fan the flames. Eighteen houses were set ablaze, and about half of these were totally destroyed. Among the latter was the KNOX hat store on the corner of Fulton Street.

Mr. BARNUM began his career as showman, in 1835, by exhibiting JOYCE HETH, a decrepit woman reputed to have been the nurse of GEORGE WASHINGTON. This proved a lucky speculation, and out of it he presently AGAIN inaugurated a traveling show. In 1841 he bought SCUDDER'S Museum, for which he paid $15,000, and added to it the contents of PEALE'S Museum. SCUDDER'S Museum had been founded in 1810, and the building has since been known as BARNUM'S, with a considerable addition on the lower side. This Museum was the only place of resort for amusement that could be called strictly moral. Those living in the city used it periodically. The first thing to be done by the sight-seeing visitor to the city was to go to BARNUM'S. Among the many attractions was the Lecture Room, with its dramatic performance three times a day. BARNUM had a magnificent stock, over other theatrical establishments, that of appreciating the value of a name. It was a happy thought of his, that of inaugurating the plan of what he called the "Moral Drama." The difference between the plays and those performed at other theatres was not discernible. The audience who would have deemed it a disgrace to have attended WALLACK'S or NIBLO'S, would sit with a good conscience in the Lecture Room listening to something which was called a moral drama. What will become of these people who support such scrupulous consciences now that the Lecture Room is no more and the curtain closed upon the moral drama?

It is impossible to record this accident without sincere regret for the loss suffered by the whole community. If to presume upon a large measure of credulity designates a humbug, then BARNUM was decidedly one for a humbug. And it is to be considered that he afforded to thousands of visitors more agreeable and useful instruction, and at the same time much of amusement than could be obtained elsewhere for double the money, we must pronounce him the most successful of all the many humbugs with which we are acquainted.

Mr. BARNUM during the conflagration was absent at Hartford. The next morning he was in New York, and issued a card to the public, announcing his determination to enter immediately upon the formation of a new and more attractive Museum. In the mean time he proposes to translate the Moral Drama from the Lecture Room to some other convenient hall. The change certainly seems very desirable from the former close and ungainly room in which the performances were given at the Museum.

LAUNCH OF THE "MADAWASKA."

THE Madawaska, screw, 16, was successfully launched on Saturday, July 8, at the Boston Navy-yard, in the presence of many witnesses. The Madawaska is the mate of the Wyoming, launched at the same place last January. The beauty of design and of workmanship is one of the very finest of our navy-built vessels, or of any vessels of her class that upon any seas are to be met afloat. She was christened by Miss DELANO, the daughter of Naval Constructor T. F. DELANO, her designer and builder. Among the many distinguished persons present at the launch were Rear-Admiral BELL, Rear-Admiral BRADFORD, Rear-Admiral GREGORY, Commodore SELFRIDGE, Chief Engineer WOOD, Naval Constructor DELANO, Captain M'KINSTRY, Captain FOXHALL, Commander WOOD, Paymaster BRIDGE, and Paymaster BENNETT. The principles of the Madawaska are designed by Mr. ERICSSON, and called patent-lever engines. They have two cylinders, 100 inches in diameter and 48 inches stroke of piston, to perform 60 revolutions. They are placed amidships of the coal-bunkers, and by making a clear passage for the air to pass through. She will be ready for service in about four months.

A HUSBAND'S EPISODES.

I DREAMT a note in my garden bower;
A note of coming, and kisses of love.
My fair young wife was abroad at that hour:
I saw the cedar branches move.

And two dark shadows, one of a man,
Certainly pass'd across the lawn
Into the glass-roofed conservatory.
When the chamber was still and the curtains drawn.

At last I said, when the morning came
And she was as sleek as a cunning dove,
Shall we go forth, my darling, to-day?
From the languid-nests and the cedar grove,

And seek the open air of the sea,
Where the blue waves gallop and clash the shore,
Just as the heart of a man, set free,
Bounds toward the exalted religion of yore?"

We went; for she did not spy my drift:
She only saw that down by the sea
There would be many a change and shift,
And many a chance of escape from me.

But I was aware of a certain walk,
Close to the edge of the cliffs so tall,
Where ledges and lumps of chalky chalk
Break off to the deep, that swallows them all.

We walk'd there once, and not in vain;
Forever in mind had not slid
But the rock was loosen'd now by rain,
And I thought it would slide that day. It did.

So she went down with its into the foam;
And, the overwary lover was left alone.
I turn'd (with craps on my hat) toward home,
And seated a while till the sad should be.

I had not long to wait for him:
He came, with malice shut up in his eyes,
With his tongue so thin, and his smile so trim,
And gave me comfort, and gave me sighs:

But when I went with him back to the train—
"Just as a friend should do, you know—"
He said she told him to meet me again.
And, whether I let his damp hand go

A little too sharply, who can tell?
I saw him, with a gesture of wrath and grim,
Under the gridiron wheels he fell:
And the train went over him limb by limb.

As I drove home that glorious night
I did not laugh; for you see, my groom
Was sitting behind with his face so white;
And he could tell tales to his mistress' room.

But I gave my leader the lightest touch
Of a whip that would hardly bear control,
And I stifled a few weak sighs very much—
Of the merry tune that fill'd my soul.

Ah well! The work of my life is done;
And I should be rather glad if you knew,
To get away from the shining sun,
And hide my triumph beneath my woe.

JANETTE MURRAY'S LOVER.

THERE is not a valley in all the world so sweet as the valley of the Walcomase, where I was born, and where I lived a happy, careless child's life until I was fifteen. Then my father died, and soon after my mother sank under the burden of life and left me an orphan. I was old enough to go out to service, and found myself a servant-girl, and very much the sum things happened every day. Every spring and summer, every fall and winter seemed like every other spring, summer, fall, and winter which had come for all the years I could remember. That was so far as my eyes could see, however. But of an evening one need not have gone far to have been startled out of this dull quiet. We lived on the hillside, in a group of cottages, among the lower-garden on all three sides of it except the road-side; and on one side there was an arbor of cultivated vine. It followed the line of the road down that way a little you came upon the village hotel, the Old Red House, as it was called. Every, if you were there of a night of the year, you would hear enough of the world's noise. There the farmers gathered together from all the hotels in the valley for miles around. There they drank and sang and gamed till midnight. The Old Red House was the centre of many mischievous, and sometimes criminal, proceedings. It made the valley famous all over the country.

The Walcomase, however, was an open and boisterous kind; but sometimes criminal deeds were done in the neighborhood of which no record was driven beyond the boundaries of Walcomase. No one knew the actors, and the most careful scrutiny of the curious could not penetrate to the heart of the mystery.

I remember in particular a series of such crimes which happened before my eighteenth year, with which my fate afterward seemed to mix.

These terrible events occurred at great intervals apart, but all alike were invested with the same thick mantle of darkness. What sensational novels are nowadays to the minds of young girls the stories of these events were then to mine. The disappearance, evidently by violence, of one of the constables was easily enough accounted for when it happened, for every body forthwith attributed it to the Anti-Renters—there was no mystery about that! But it was a very different affair when young Philip Sneider went from his home to the Corners to see a circus performance and never returned. It was another affair when Late Richmond, the keeper of the inn, stepped out one evening and was seen no more in the little village. Quite another affair when the bar-maid of the inn was found strangled to death—this violence having evidently occurred to her as she was in the act of opening the blinds of the bar-room at early daylight—or when Nic Marvin, known as an inveterate old miser, and who lived alone on top of the hill in sight almost of our little cottage, was discovered one morning to have been murdered. In this latter circumstance there appeared to have been a mercenary motive leading to the act, as every board of the floor of the miser's wretched hut was torn up in search of the hoarded treasure which common report had located there. But in these latter cases no such motive could be traced. Young Sneider had nothing about his person more valuable than an old silver watch and a constitutional quarrel. Late Richmond was supposed to have no money about his person, and surely the poor bar-maid had nothing in her possession worth plundering. Nor could it be imagined that the little inn at the village, and the miser's house on the hill, became in my mind, after the performance of these tragedies, centres of indefinable dread. I believe I would sooner have died than have slept for one night in a room of the Old Red House, or have passed alone by Nic Marvin's ruined dwelling-place in the broadest daylight. But these things had no deeper meaning for me—at least so it seemed to me then—than for my sister Jo; and I lived, as I said at the beginning, a happy and careless life at old Farmer Bonesteel's.

II.

I THINK I was still happier though when I became acquainted with Jemmy Boyce. When I first saw him I was quite eighteen years old, and was fully twenty-eight. He had an easy way with him, and was not far from handsome, I thought, with his curly black hair, his slim form, and his thoughtful, careless manner of talking. It was at least a change in my humdrum life, and there were not ever many of these. But in Walcomase that fell in my way—and he put himself in my way with a persistence that I must confess touched my girlish vanity. Naturally something about Jemmy Boyce did not altogether please me. I do not know whether it was an expression which lurked in his dull gray eyes; or if it had been in his face a certain devil-may-care manner. Nor did I think of it much in any way at that time. He was the most unsteady of men, and used to business. For he would be going about mending the farmers' clocks—and it was in this way I first became acquainted with him—and then again he would take to peddling fancy wares about the country. In the summer he generally worked about among farmers, but he was not considered the most reliable of workmen on account of his unconquerable aversion to hard and constant labor. He did not mean to work much which I had formed of my future lover. I had anticipated more of romance and gentle feeling—though I was not sentimental—but Jemmy Boyce though he manifested a great deal of fondness for me, was abrupt in his manner of showing it. Though usually quiet and reserved he was always wild and sometimes moody. But I remembered that for years he had no fixed home, and no mother or sister to love him. And his occupation was unsteady and coarse and brutal men. Indeed I concluded—as I suppose many other girls have done in a similar case—that Jemmy would be more gentle when he might have proved, still he did not seem likely to make his appearance, whereas Jemmy had, and a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. I certainly made up my mind that I was in love with him.

When Jemmy began to pay attentions to me it was about six months after the old miser was murdered. It was not long before we were betrothed, and he urged a speedy marriage. But I put him off, which vexed him and made him sullen. Finding that I was not easily won by his anger he changed his policy, and tried to persuade me by soft words. Perhaps I might have consented if the persuasive words had been kind, but they were not so. I cannot explain it; but when he assumed a particularly loving manner he was really repulsive to me. And I believe that at that time he would have gladly seemed to disclose itself. He gave me rich presents—that in rich for his position—generally of jewelry. Those presents, because they appealed to my vanity, which was very great. Once he gave me two bright gold-eagles, which I had set in a brooch unconcealed pleasure. But as Jemmy was always a spendthrift with his money I did not take these things from him without a feeling of detachment. At any rate I kept fast to my resolution not to marry him until he obtained some settled and remunerative occupation. In the meantime Farmer Bonesteel and his wife were much opposed to the match, and this perhaps helped me keep to my resolution.

It was now fall summer. Jemmy and I had not been on the best of terms for a week or two; at least he had seemed cross to me. About the time our little village was startled by the news that Judge Thompson had been waylaid at night as he was driving home, that he had been many hours absent narrowly escaped the hands of the marauder. The road from our cottage, down by the Old Red House, and over a short distance, led to the White Bridge, which spanned the Walcomase River. After passing this bridge you came to a road which was almost inclined on either side by dense shrubbery. This shrubbery skirted the Judge's beautiful grounds; and it was through the hedge, that the marauder had made his dastardly attempt.

This sad news filled me with great sorrow; for it now seemed that the whole neighborhood was haunted with the horror of murder; and it seemed singularly sad that this event should have occurred at a place which was the favorite resort of the everyone such on the road-side. Summer after summer I had gathered berries from the shady coverts of that delightful hedge of shrubbery. It was to this dreadful association which had been connected with the place, yet it was hardly a month before I ventured in that direction. I ought not to give myself credit for the venture, though; for in the middle of the afternoon, my work for the day being over, I had nothing to do. And had unconsciously got to the other side of the bridge before I thought of the affair which had previously given me so much uneasiness. It was broad day, and the place was so charming that I lingered. At length, growing bolder, I neared into the miniature thicket. Oh, the bright berries and the cool shade were so tempting! I crept in and ate till my lips and fingers were red, and as I was sitting languidly in the cool shade I fell asleep. I slept for a long time. I remember I was dreaming of the long bridge—I thought I was crossing it, and it seemed so interminably long—and I thought I was on the end. I was reached at last, I came into the shrubbery, and it grew dark suddenly, and I heard a rustling in the bushes. A man sprang forth to seize me, and then I awoke with a scream, and saw full before me Jemmy Boyce, and I did not know whether I was frightened or assured. The sun had gone down and it was quite dark. A thunder-storm was fast coming on, which increased the darkness. Jemmy Boyce's excited and startled face as I first awoke seemed only to add a fearful reality to my dream.

I started up, and my first instinct was to run; but my second thought was to get Jemmy's protection on my way home. As I turned to him he said, in a hurried manner,

"Run, Nettie, run home or you'll be caught. Don't you see the black clouds and hear the thunder? It'll rain dogs and cats in ten minutes. Run for your life!"

I was astounded. Was he going to let me go alone? I plead with him. "Oh, Jemmy, won't you come with me? I shall die—I know I shall die be come that dreadful bridge alone! Oh, you must come!"

"But I can't, Nettie," said he, starkly, his face as ugly as death with some wild-angry excitement. "I'm very sorry. But I can't. My work is—I must go the other way to-night. Good-by!"

I turned away from my gay, but my words sank into my throat before his stern and almost threatening face. I turned and ran, though it seemed as if I must sink at every step. It seemed as if I was running in a dream, under the influence of a torturing nightmare. I had been in the habit of walking rapidly at times with rain, and so weary that I could scarcely draw after me my bedraggled garments. Exhausted and terror-stricken I could not look into a lethargic stupor. For more than a month I was in a raving fever. When I recovered—and I remembered nothing—I was told that I was able to bear it, that the Judge and his wife had been murdered and robbed, and that the murderer had not been captured. It was not known to any one where I had been on that dreadful afternoon; and it was not until long afterward that I knew that the Judge had been murdered about the very afternoon, and while I was sleeping by the road-side.

III.

AFTER my recovery Jemmy's courtship progressed rapidly. He obtained a respectable and lucrative situation in the Iron-works, and worked very industriously at his new occupation. I, for my part, was very happy in the spring. Our wedding was a simple affair. There was no gathering together of friends to the marriage festival of Jemmy and I went quietly together to Parson Jones's and were married, with the Parson's wife and two children as Jemmy had built a house during the winter on the very spot previously occupied by Nic Marvin's hut. Jemmy, I think, had the taste for the work, and to live. And here I began a life of horror. A loneliness soon began to oppress me, with nothing to relieve it. For Jemmy, though I think he was fond of me at the first, yet seemed to have no fresh or cheerful ways, and lived a very silent and morose life. The thought of happiness proved very idle, and tried to recover his lighter moods by being cheerful myself. But alas! there was no recovery possible, because it had been buried in the dreadful grave secret and sought to penetrate it. I had wondered from the first that he had chosen that spot of all others for a home. I had remonstrated against it; but what could I say when he told me that he was only poor man, and that the house was bought for half its value—that otherwise, indeed, he could not think of building any where for some time to come? I consented, though not with a good grace. But after our marriage I discovered that my husband was growing to be as miserly as he had been a spendthrift before. He would not think of buying the place was that he wanted an opportunity to search for that old miser Marvin's gold. He did not tell me this; but I saw the hateful fever in fact of his own. But I watched him closely. When he thought I was asleep I have seen him revolving about in the yard with his little lantern—unless, indeed, it was a moonlight night. He did not know that his wife was watching, and with what terror!

He left him to his insane search and crept away to bed.

In this way he grew to be an alien in my eyes, and the house grew to be like one that is haunted. I was Fatima shut up in an old Bluebeard's castle. And one day—I think I remember well—I came to know—I unwittingly penetrated into the secret closet of the castle.

My husband had in his desk a box which he always kept carefully locked. He kept all his money in this box with his papers. One day I found this box by some accident open. The desk was in a little room up stairs, which had a window in it overlooking the landscape, that is this view looked the river's course. Seeing the box open, my first impulse was to shut it; but the next was to just take one peep at its contents. Lying down in one corner among some papers, I saw a little roll of bank bills, and upon the top one I noticed a red stain of blood. Thinking more curiously I grew more dizzy—for I read the name of the bank, which was that of Brandon—and I knew that this was the name of the bills which had been advertised just after the Judge's murder as those which he had then in his possession. An overwhelming flood of terror deluged my mind and senses so that I could scarcely stand. Leaning against the window I looked out upon the landscape, following the river's course with my eye down to the White Bridge and over to the little park, in the midst of which nestled Judge Thompson's mansion. It was a year ago since that dreadful afternoon, but the whole scene came up before me with marvelous freshness. A dark suspicion crossed my mind, which no effort of mine could avert; and, as if in answer to my thoughts, I that moment saw my husband coming up the road. When I met him at the door I could not conceal my agitation, and I think in that moment he read my whole thought as clearly as if it had been written in letters on my pallid features. And I knew that he read it. Ah! these Bluebeards, they know every thing. And that wretched Fortunée Falaise never a mask for her tell-tale face. There were no words between us about the matter. What need of words between those who had read each other perfectly—one through cunning, and the other through the symbols of fear.

I can not tell you, reader, how great was the agony of the few following weeks. I saw a gulf open before me and all around, infinite in its awful depth. I was scarcely sane. Even the fiercest selfish fear of what Jemmy might do to me—gave place to the sense of awe. That which I had previously called my loneliness became now a fearful shadow of horror. Ay, no one can know the full terror of solitude until that solitude has in some way been associated with an awful crime. It was brought close to face this murder—alone of all save him who did it.

Justice walks with stealthy but never-failing footsteps. She stood by me in that little room up stairs when I made that fatal discovery, and communed with me, "Go, proclaim this awful thing!" But I was weak for that. And she, who spareth not, chose other agencies for her purpose. It was not long before Jemmy heard the summons, though his miserable wife had no part in it. One night in August, 18—, Jack was heard just after dark to be looked out of the window and saw two men, and knew that they had come for Jemmy. They took him as he was loitering in the garden and carried him away. He was tried, and the evidence against him was considered sufficient. He had been discovered searching in the shrubbery by the bridge, and had been seen taking money from a box hidden under ground among the bushes—a hiding-place, reader, while I was sleeping on that sunger afternoon. He was convicted and sentenced to suffer death. While in prison he made a full confession, from which it became apparent that he had been the murderer of many others than these two innocent people that he had deluded years before—and, strange to say, he was not the only one of his watch and a few bits of change; that he had made away with the in-keeper and the four others from simple revenge; and that he had murdered old Nic Marvin, though he did not succeed in finding any of his money after a few stray pieces of silver. He was this man whom I had married, and promised to obey and love and honor, which should be my fate! That death should have parted us at the scaffold! But so it was. I had a brief interview with him just before the last. I had to be brief—I could not bear to hear such thoughts, and shrank, half-frightened, away from him. Since then I have only had one wish—that I might be a child again, and live the pleasant valley in which I had first seen the light, and where I had spent so many happy years, might have the same still look once again for me. But that wish was a dream which never came true.

AT MRS. SHODDY'S.

WE were a party of four—two ladies and two gentlemen—who, in consequence of receiving a highly lettered invitation to Mrs. Shoddy's grand reception, had on the appointed evening proceeded in state to her showy residence in the Fifth Avenue, the door of which, by-the-way, is believed by "the Shoddy" to lead to heaven direct.

Our "drawing-room" was a spacious parlor, peculiar, and suggestive of strange scenes to follow; but being, as we believed, well endowed with the wealth of the Vere de Veres, we descended toward the scene of action, with a tranquil consciousness of being in every way equal to the occasion, and not very fout of the stairway we were accosted by no less personages than the hostess herself and her "groom upon" daughter. The latter looked very much anxious; but the mother, gorgeous in an intensely blue silk, and a huge coronet of pink and purple artificial flowers, evidently felt no misgivings. Both stared at us unconditionally. Suddenly a light illumined the countenance of the elder lady, as she broke forth in a loud, emphatic tone:

"Well, I declare! Mrs. Davis and Mr. Ellis! How do you do?" And Miss Ellis! glad to see you, I'm sure; but the lights and every thing dazzles me so I don't hardly know people. Miry, my dear, this is Mr. Ellis and Mrs. Davis, both friends of your Pa, and Mr. Ellis's daughter." (Aside to me:) "Who did you say the other gentleman was? Oh yes! Mr. Stevens! Glad to see you, I'm sure you may depend. Young gentlemen are so scarce. Couldn't hardly get up the party for it. The war, you see, takes the best of 'em off. Dear me! there—ha! ha! I didn't mean no offense! But every young gentleman at a party counts one—don't they, Miry?"

"Lor'! Ma!" simpered Miss Shoddy, blushing resplendently. Here Mr. Stevens, always superbly master of himself, gracefully hastened to the rescue, and in a moment Myra was laughing the girlish laugh which, thank Heaven! even Shoddy can not make unmusical.

"Dear me!" sighed the matron pathetically, without offering to usher us to pass into the drawing-rooms, "they've been pouring in thick as strup all the evening! I'm so exhausted I can't hardly stand up."

Then followed a painful silence. Through the arched rose-wood doorway we could see the gayly-dressed throng within—a sea of blue, pink, and white, in which frantic creatures in black brandished and writhed as the leader seemed to be beating and whirling. Suddenly the music ceased. The waves heaved violently a moment, then parted like a Dead Sea, crested with gauze and gossamer, while an army of Israelites, bearing silver trays laden with ices, passed safely through the temporary opening.

"Gracious!" exclaimed the hostess at last, with an apologetic start, "I ought to take you in. Miry," she added, nodding her head sideways toward us, as she spoke, "you must introduce them."

"Oh, mother," was the sotto voce reply, "I can't do it—I feel too used up."

"Yes, you must"—very austerely—"I shan't do it."

The refractory daughter was conquered. "Well, mother, do you know I'm so nervous. I'll do it all together, but I can't introduce 'em separate."

Thus encouraged, we humbly followed the young lady, and, after being presented to the most unremarkable manner to the staring marmalds and mormen, we found ourselves slowly drifting toward an anchorage by the glittering saloon.

Young faces were there, radiant with intense enjoyment; older faces, with a startled, puzzled look upon them, as though the unaccustomed scene wrought more anxiety than pleasure; hard faces varnished with a matte smile; soft, unimperpetable faces, which were either saintly or horribly vicious; and faces without any expression at all.

We had passed on to the most available hostess, and were contemplating a dignified retreat to the dressing-rooms above, when we saw that lady bearing toward us with a fixed smile, her own ceiling faces floating about her expansive shoulders, and glittering bracelets upon her rosseate arms: still there was something in her manner, in her manner and appearance that we were forced to risk the Scylla of an alarming gravity in order not to fall into the Charybdis of a positive laughter. Standing of rebuke smote me, however, when her lady-ship, in a tone of unmistakable displeasure, said:

"You look kind o' lonesome, Mrs. Davis; 'fraid you ain't enjoyin' yourself?"

"Oh, yes!" I hastily answered, with the ardent imbecility with which persons usually perpetrate social fibs.

"Ain't you danced?" (with a look that said, "If people dare to slight you here, just let me know.")

"Thank you! I really would prefer—"

"Nonsense," interrupted Mrs. Shoddy, "going to have no wall-flowers in this company. I want to introduce you to a gentleman from Washington—monstrous fine feller, I tell you. Mr. Senator Jasper" made a hundred and ninety-five thousand dollars in the last two months!"

It was in vain to resist. I remember a huge Titan in dancing-master attire—a flabby, villainous countenance—extending himself from the centre of a wall of ruffled linen—an atmosphere heavy with pomade—and an avalanche of "Excuse me, mama" following rapidly upon the heels of a most unpardonable heart-rending desertion and escapades during the progress of "The Lancers." Beyond this my impressions are somewhat confused, though, in fact, there are many things connected with the occasion that I would "willingly let die," not excepting the monstrous supper which followed.

Before the evening was over I found myself in a smaller apartment, gorgeously furnished, and enshared truly enough in a large, gilt-and-velvet-lovely-framed paintings which nearly covered the walls. A human quartette was seated upon the sofa, à la Newbig, and it struck me that it was to escape from me that I saw the four children of our hostess. Feminine bustle and masculine repose were represented there in equal parts; but that effect was purely a matter of faith, as nothing in their faces betrayed that they had ever uttered a sound.

Soon the mother appeared. "Lor'! Mrs. Davis, you here? Well, I have got out of the parlors for a minute—it's a suffocation! This is our family setting-room. Ellen, stick in your shoulder, miss!" (This last was a dramatic aside, directed to the sole daughter who had the audacity to sit the painting's. Well, we have got lots of them, that's certain. I tell Mr. Shoddy we'll have a picture gallery before we know it. Ha! ha! that 'ud be a thing—for the man's bound to have every thing that money can buy—"

(Here a radiant, satisfied ripple of expression ran across the quartette upon the sofa.)

I tried to say something, but alas! the allusion to the painting had temporarily paralyzed my gravity to such an extent that I could only cough pathetically.

"This 'ere big picture," pursued Mrs. Shoddy, "it is a landscape—a landscape by—children! who is this landscape by?"

"Mr. Bensen," they all answered in a breath, closing their mouths instantly like four traps.

"Yes, Mr. Bensen. He's a Western man, Mrs. Davis, and don't charge more'n a quarter what these New York painters ask. He paints pretty, tho', don't he? Now you see that there blue danned depicted therein balanced a huge butterfly upon her shoulder, and her youthful companion had the inveterate habit of stripping off the mischievous God of Love.

"That picture," broke forth Mrs. Shoddy, standing in superb disdain beside me, "ain't my taste—Mr. Shoddy bought it. It's a fancy piece, you see —Cupid and—children what did your Pa say was the name of this picture?"

"Cupid and Per-sick!" answered the two elder ones simultaneously.

"Oh yes, Cupid and Persi*ck*. But, Mrs. Davis, you must look at our portraits. We've had one artist for a year past doing all our family. Here's Mr. Shoddy and me. You may think the yellow gloves in my picture sin't mates—any one might—but they are; the artist was bound to put one of them 'in shadder,' in spite of all I could say. This is Dan's picture (air up strait, Dan'd, and let go your sister's scalp); it's like him, all but the hair. The naughty boy" (looking severely at Daniel) "burned off one side of his curls last week, and we had to cut off the rest. Here's our youngest, Tommy—the end one on the sofa there—most beautiful boy! Always just as sassy and lively as you see him in the picture—exactly it like him, Mrs. Davis?"

Shade of Polonius, pity me! Tommy was a blue, moist-skinned little fellow, who looked as if he were in a state of chronic somnambulism. What could I do but falter, "Very like," without venturing to take a second look at the original?

"Mr. Bensen," she went on, never seen a harder child to paint," resumed Mrs. Shoddy; "it was so difficult to get his expression." (Alack! I should think it would have been very difficult.) "He took him at first with only one shoe on, and the other layin' on the carpet; but I wasn't going to have a child of mine looked at in that; so I made Mr. Bensen alter it quick. I told him to just change the shoe on the carpet to the foot, or something of that kind, and then to put good Balmorals on the poor child. It's bad enough to have your own flesh and blood sittin' there for all the house, without having their likeness took all in a mass! This is Katy.

"I had Ellen here," continued Mrs. Shoddy (lashing down the unfortunate child with a speech-lesson of high art), "taken correct in every thing but her chest. I ordered Mr. Bensen to make that back, because the child is so awful flat that it would only worry her father and me to see it hangin' before us all the time. Besides, Ellen's going to be a full-developed child—I feel it! Children! what's the name of Dr. Lewises place?"

"Gyms-nas-jum!" replied the sofa, promptly.

"Yes, gymnasium—that's it. Well, she's going there regular like from this, and Dr. Lewis says he'll soon fetch her chest out perfect.

"Here is another picture now that you must see" (pointing to an excessively painted waterfall, resembling a cascade-shaped jet of green calves'-foot jelly and gingerbread). "This picture is my daughter Miry's work—ain't it beautiful? But do you know that our husband is dispossitively—that's her talent! I showed Mr. Bensen (the one that does all our pictures, except the frames—they come from Goupil's) what a genius she was, and told him that Miry's teacher said she had great talent for painting, and, says he, 'Madam, if your daughter has a talent for art, it is in the water-paint line.' And he was right from looking at that waterfall" she added, triumphantly.

"Yes, Mr. Benson being a painter, could put his finger right on Miry's talent:" it was he, madam,' says he, 'it must be it's—' Heavens! Ellen Ann! Ellen Davis!"

This startling peroration was caused by an exclusive movement of that child Daniel, who, having fallen asleep upright upon the sofa, was announcing, by a preliminary pantomime, his intention of favor the company with himself upon the floor. Immediately Ellen Ann was equal to the emergency. "Dan's ill;" precious nose was saved, and the youth restored by gentle wakefulness by means of a brisk maternal shaking.

"Gracious!" exclaimed Mrs. Shoddy, becoming suddenly conscious that, though art may be "long, time is fleeting," "I ought to be in the parlor with the company. What will folks think of me? Dear me! what a time I've had! So saying, the lady vanished in a glimmer of blue, purple, and pink.

Those last significant words were echoed in my brain again and again that night, during the wakeful hours that followed my introduction into "Shoddy" society. Mrs. Shoddy! what will folks think of her? What a bother! what a bother!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"THE is quite unbearable," said Brain, at the conflagration of Barnum's Museum, "I'm off for Wall Street!"

WHEN can donkey be spelt with one letter? When it's NOTHING else.

BARNUM was traveling once on board of one of the river steamers, where they feed you for a moderate outlay twenty-five times a day;

very sumptuously, but the portions supplied are usually of microscopic dimensions. He called at one time for a beef-steak. The waiter brought him a thin, almost little, shriveled mite of broiled flesh, evidently not sufficient for more than two mouthfuls. Barnum poised the morsel on a fork, examined it critically, as though it were a couple of steak submitted to his inspection, and then returned it to the waiter, saying, "Yes, that's what I mean. Bring me some of that."

RICH HEIRS. — "Time is money" to a rapid writing. Thyme may be money, but the mint produces it. Shakspeare tells us of "a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." A sweet time a man would have had getting money out of that bank! But Time is a very good thing to be allowed when a bill falls due, but after all we would rather have a mint of money, and we should then be sure of having a good time.

COCKNEY ZOOLOGY.—Precocious young lady:—"Law, ma, here's a beast in!" Maternal (suspiciously):—"A beagle! Oh, you impudent hussy! I'll 'ave you to know that 'e's an hon'rable!" Keeper of the menagerie (respectfully):—"Axe pardon, marm, 'tis an ass."

A young lady who was rebuked by her mother for kissing her intended, justified herself by quoting the passage, "Whosoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

MIXED METAPHOR.—The following specimen of this failing is taken from the Washington Star:—"The apple of discord is now fairly in our midst, and if not nipped in the bud, it will burst forth in a conflagration which will deluge the sea of politics with an earthquake of heroism."

AN Irishman and a Yankee met at a tavern, and there was but one bed for them. On entering, the Yankee said he did not care which side of the bed he took. "Then," said Pat, "you may take the under side."

A somewhat juvenile dandy said to a fair partner at a ball, "Miss Mary Ann, may I have the pleasure of dancing?" To which she replied, "Well, sir, they may be dancing? To which she replied, "Well, sir, they may be dancing, but they have not yet arrived."

A LUCKY GHOST—The ghost of a chance.

IT is said there are 400,000 feathers upon the wing of a full-grown eagle, and that any one of them is the result of the statement can easily satisfy himself by counting them.

SIR William B——, being at a parish meeting, made some proposals that were objected to by a farmer. Highly enraged, "Sir," said he to the farmer, "do you know, Sir, that I have been to the two Universities, and at two colleges in each University?" "Well, Sir," said the farmer, "what of that? I had a calf that sucked two cows, and the observation I made was, the more he sucked the greater calf he grew."

THE Japanese say, "The tongue of woman is her sword, and she never lets it grow rusty for want of using."

As her pretti nices red tew her, "breaches or faith" occurred in the tor. "Britches of faith," reiterated Widow Bobbins. "The Lord help us! how fashions change, unto-ane! I wunder what the men will ware next?" A cold blush inflamed the cheek of her niece, but she left the kind ant unaffrighted, and continued with what she was readin.

THE DESERT FOR A DWELLING-PLACE.—It is easy enough for a sound man to renounce society and go into the desert: the only difficulty is to find them.

A husband complained of his wife before a magistrate for assault and battery, and it appeared in evidence that he had pushed the door against her and she in turn had pushed it against him, whereupon the counsel for the defendant said that he could see no impropriety in a husband and wife a-dooring each other.

A gentleman, about whose Teutonic origin there could be but one opinion, was passing along the street a few days since, when he came to a halt before one of the huge square monuments of gingerbread in the confectioner's Parlance Lost. He read this line, "A Rebellion in Heaven," when he broke forth as follows: "A Rebellion in Heaven; mine Got! that lasts not long now.—Unkel Abe leh him."

There is both a Spanish and a French proverb which says, "A melon and a woman are hard to choose."

The editor of a country paper puts a dozen short questions to a correspondent, and concludes with calling him "a brandy barrel." Whereupon the "opponent" writes, "If he has that opinion of me he must be very fond of pumping us."

An old lady was complaining a few days since, in the market, of the excessive high price of provisions.—"It is market, of the excessive high price of provisions.—"It is not the meat only that is so enormously dear," said she, "but I can not obtain flour for a pudding for less than double the usual price, and they do not make the eggs half as large as they used to be!"

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH CABLE.

ONCE more the attempt is to be made to link together in the closest amity the two great branches of the Anglo-SAXON race. A previous attempt was made seven years ago, but failed, or rather was but partially successful. But the compliments exchanged by the submarine cable of 1858 between our President and the British Queen, though so soon followed by an obstruction in the line, were, after all, justly regarded as the first-fruits of an enterprise that must in the end be crowned with success.

The Great Eastern, in whose capacious hold the precious coil has been stowed away in tanks, is already on her way from Valencia to Newfoundland; and it is expected that within the present month regular telegraphic communication will be established between the two hemispheres; and that shortly the New York journals will commence a daily summary of the London news of the day before. We give on this page an illustration representing the final view taken by visitors of the Great Eastern on the 224 of June. As this was the last visit allowed to be made to the ship before her departure, great eagerness was shown to be present on the occasion, and a large and most distinguished party assembled. The visitors started soon after twelve, and before two o'clock were alongside the great ship, which, even making allowance for her great depth in the water, now nearly 32 feet, still seems to look even more grand and massive than ever. There is little more than her size, however, just now to attract admiration, for probably at no time during her checkered career has the Great Eastern ever been so dirty, or has her expanse of deck worn a more littered and unsightly aspect.

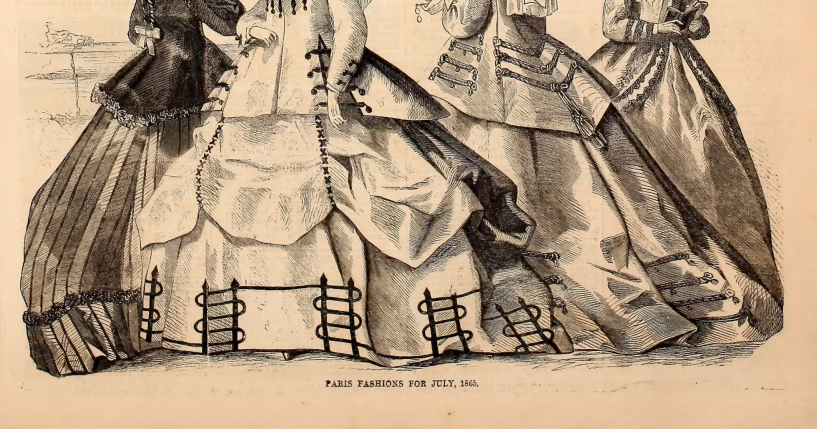
The visitors made the usual rambling inspection of all parts of the vessel—saloons, berths, engine-rooms, and every where. The great attractions were, of course, the cable, and especially that amidships, where the last couple of miles of the wire were being slowly wound inboard. Two short messages were sent through the cable—one through a section 1500 miles long, another through its entire length from end to end. The battery power used was very low, and the signals, though slow, were wonderfully clear and distinct. After these slight experiments had been completed the visitors were conducted to the grand saloon, where a most excellent déjeuner had been laid, and to which their journey down enabled them to do substantial justice. At the conclusion of the déjeuner Mr. PENDER, M.P., expressed his belief and hope that the cable would be successfully laid, and that it would promote the happiness, the communion, and the peace of Great Britain and the United States, which had already so much in common to unite them. THE DUKE OF SOMERSET proposed "Success to the Atlantic Telegraph," and in a few emphatic words declared that the success of this great enterprise would tend to promote the best interests, political and commercial, of the two great and kindred nations. Mr. PENDER observed that they were honored with the presence of one who had devoted the energies of the last few years of his life in England to preserve the amicable relations between the two countries, at a period of no ordinary difficulty, with singular energy and success. He believed that whatever position Mr. ADAMS, whose father and grandfather had already filled such important offices, might be called on to fill in his own country, he would be followed by the good wishes and respect of all who knew what services he had rendered and what ability he had displayed while he was among us. Mr. ADAMS, who was warmly received, thanked the chairman and the company for the way in which they had expressed their sense of his services and for the manner in which they had alluded to his country. During the recent troubles he confessed he was selfish enough to hope the cable might not be laid, as he well knew he would have been overwhelmed with telegrams; but now that the war which had distracted his country had been put an end to, he wished with all his heart that one of the greatest enterprises that had ever been conceived might be successfully carried through, as he believed it would do more than any other agency to strengthen the bonds of union between the two countries. The interests and objects of the Government of Great Britain had all along been to maintain peace; and now that the contest which had distracted the United States had been put an end to, the sole object they had in view was peace also.

On June 24 the Great Eastern was removed from her moorings in Sheerness harbor to the Nore. The greatest precautions had been taken to effect the operation in safety, and it was completed without accident.

THE FASHIONS AT THE SEA-SIDE.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JULY.

THE summer modes are now quite settled in many important points. All through the season, which began on the 21st ult., the whole of the dress—corsage, skirt, and pardessus—should be alike in color and material, and the entire toilet passably simple, with as few ornaments as possible. This simplicity is really the distinguishing characteristic of the fashions at the present moment, but as an indication of a return to moderation in dress it is not worthy of much reliance.



The taste for scarfs seems about to revive, and has particularly received encouragement from the Empress Eugenie, who appeared at the late great race for the Grand Prix de Paris at Longchamps in a magnificent cloth-of-gold scarf presented to her Majesty by the Emperor on his return from Algeria. Some of the scarfs already worn are very elegant; they may be either plain, of the same material as the dress, or striped, and edged with ruching or lace. A muslin scarf over a taffeta robe is extremely becoming, as well as a very agreeable toilet for hot weather; moreover, the shawl and the burnous, especially the former, are almost of necessity put aside during the months of June, July, and August.

One change of consequence has been adopted by many of the Parisiennes élégantes, and that is the abandonment of under jupons of a color different to that of the dress. A serious return to white appears to be generally resolved upon; but having been decided somewhat suddenly, the upon blanc may not yet strictly be considered as de rigueur.

For morning or for evening toilet the styles of coiffure are varied. For the evening, ringlets, frizzled hair, and plaits, raised very high upon the top of the head, are perfectly admissible; but the volume of the capillary ornament is not very extensive. For morning, the plait may lie down in front en couronne, or the bands be slightly waved. A ringlet or two behind the plaits, and falling on the neck, may also be worn in the day.

Patronage is still shared to an equal extent by the chapeau empire and the chapeau fanchon; both are elegant in their way, and the selection of the one or of the other should be made to depend more upon the style of the face of the intending wearer than upon the special merits of either of the rival bonnets.

Properly speaking there are no Paris fashions for July, for Paris at present is deserted. At the favorite country resorts by the sea-side the fashions are set by Empresses, Princesses, and Grand Duchesses; and the cosmopolitan toilets almost defy detailed description, as may be seen by a reference to the smaller of our engravings, which represents some of those that have attained the greatest favor. It will be seen that the fancy of the wearer is allowed full scope; so much so, indeed, that many of the costumes might well be termed "fancy dresses." The "voiles russes" without sleeves, which appeared in some elegant toilets last winter, but were not much worn, are, now that the summer has set in, almost universally adopted, and form a charming and effective addition to any costume. They may | be either simple or elegant, of black or white lace, with fancy trimmings and ribbons, or of cashmere, bound with a bright-colored band of the same material. These vests are worn over a corsage of the | same, ruched, or nansook, and also with the "chemise russe," which has so long obtained great favor in fashionable circles.

The following is a description of this illustration in our larger engraving:

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Dress for the Sea-side or for a Watering-place.—Pearl-gray linen robe, elegantly trimmed round the skirt with three rows of narrow silk black passementerie ornaments. The stripes and the small unstitched bias complete the trimming on the black velvet. Round sleeve-head edged with black velvet and provided with a large cape, a black feather, and a bow behind in white tulle.

Fig. 2. Dress for a Morning Visit.—Dark violet foulard robe, with blue stripes. There is a deep black silk ruche, big round the skirt and round the edge of the black silk cuirass, which is also similarly trimmed at the cuffs and shoulders. Five tufts chapeau, with pink ribbons in the guise of a bonnet, and a cap of plaited black ribbon gauze round the chignon, and descending behind to the waist. The hair is arranged by a pink bow.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Light blue cloth robe, trimmed with passementerie ornaments of the same color, but a shade darker than the cloth to match. The cloaque is in white tulle, and the veil also. A few violet flowers decorate the front of the bonnet.

Fig. 4. Another Walking Dress.—Robe of dark orange-colored foulard, trimmed with elegant black guipure. The cossque of this dress is ornamented in a similar manner. White lace chapeau bonnet, furnished in front with a bouquet of green velvet, several small flowers, and two aigrettes with light green shoots.

THE TRIAL OF MISS HARRIS.

Now that the trial of the conspirators is over, the exciting topic of Washington life is the trial of Miss Mary Harris for the murder last January of Lucrezia Benincasa, a clerk in the Treasury Department at Washington. We published at the time the details of the murder, which was committed apparently to obtain revenge for Benincasa's falsehood and neglect.

The conduct of the deceased toward Miss Harris was inexcusable in any case, and was especially aggravated if it be true, as is claimed by the defense, that he sought to secure her presence in a house of ill-fame in order to fix a stigma upon her character. But from Miss Harris's own admission it appears that Benincasa's misconduct had not gone so far as to attempt her ruin under cover of a promise of marriage.

There can scarcely be a doubt in the minds of any one but that the provocation was insufficient for the justification of murder. It was necessary, therefore, for the defense to establish a separate plea—that of insanity—in order to secure Miss Harris's acquittal. This is difficult to establish; for in every particular the murder appears to have been a deliberate act. Unless the evidence of insanity should prove more conclusive than at present seems likely, we hope that it will be set aside by the jury. We have had enough of dalliance with murder on such whimsical pleas. It must not be permitted for murderers to escape in cases where no honest juryman would on the same plea let off a thief. The degree of crime must not become its excuse.

EDMUND RUFFIN.

Edmund Ruffin, the father of secession in Virginia, and who fired the first gun on Fort Sumter, committed suicide June 17, 1865. A monomaniac was found anosing his papers stating that he preferred death to living under the United States Government. He was upward of seventy-four years old when he committed this act of self-murder. At the time of his death he was staying in Amelia County, Virginia. The suicide was a deliberate act, the deluded man taking a musket loaded with backshot, and placing the muzzle in his mouth, with the aid of a stick touched the trigger. The first cap failed to explode, when he replaced it with a better one, fired the piece, and was instantly killed. The upper portion of his head was entirely blown off.

Mr. Ruffin was, many years ago, editor of the Farmers' Register, which ranked as the ablest agricultural paper of the country, and was a regular contributor to the American Farmer, the Southern Planter, and other journals of the same class, and was likewise a prolific and many years' reviewer, etc., which have been preserved in book form. He was also noted for his antipathy to the banks—so much so, that he had some of the counties named after him, as expressed by Jefferson, Randolph of Roanoke, and others, stereotyped on blocks and printed on thousand bank-notes, which he caused to be put out to be redeposited, with their own characters painted in no complimentary terms upon their backs. His death was in close to that style of his life which he devoted to rebellion against his Government. He that lets the sword must perish by the sword, even though it be through madness and by his own act.

SHADOWS ON THE STREAM.

Summer evening shadows
Thicken, drawing round;
Summer's beauteous blossoms
Strewing all the ground.

Leaning o'er the buttress,
Ruined, gray, and old;
Looking into waters,
Silent, still, and cold.

When our bright reflections
Dance its surface o'er—
When like ceaseless music
The distant torrents roar;

And the rocks before us
Kiss the water's brim,
Flinging a reflection
Between myself and him!

As we stood together,
Whispering soft and low,
Flinging harebell blossoms
On the waves below.

Laurel leaves were gleaming
Round his chaded hair,
While the rocks were frowning
O'er mine, cold and bare!

Seemed they not prophetic
Shadows on the stream?
As when vicious hands us
From a troubled dream.

Many, many summers,
With their wreaths of flowers;
Many, many winters,
With their dreary hours;

Flowing like those waters,
Life's rough pathway down;
Bringing fame's fresh leaflets
For his laurel crown!

By the gray old buttress
Lonely now I dream;
Softly, sadly watching
Shadows on the stream!

Carry's Confession.
A NOVEL.
By the Author of
"MATTIE: A STRAY."
8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A good novel.—Press.

This story is very readable. It is original in its design, and the incidents are numerous and striking.—Spectator.

This novel is equal to any former one by the same author. The story is cleverly told, and is very original. It can scarcely fail to be read with thoughtful interest. It is very far above the average run of novels, and deserves to find a reader like that to which its ephemeral works of fiction.—Athenæum.

The book well sustains the reputation already won by its writer. The interest never flags.—Patriot.

There is a great deal of startling merit in this author's writing. The general characteristics story tells an intricate history simply and well. The dramatic persons are well drawn, and show a thorough knowledge of human life. "Carry's Confession" is certainly a superior work, and one which will add to the good opinion generally held of its author.—Observer.

United States 7.30 LOAN.

THIRD SERIES,

$230,000,000.

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, the General Subscription Agent for the sale of United states Securities, offers to the public the third series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the

7.30 LOAN.

These notes are issued under date of July 15, 1865, and are payable three years from that date in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per Cent. GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These Bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County, and Municipal taxation, which adds from one to three per cent. more to their value, according to the rate levied upon other property. The interest is payable semi-annually by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold or kept for collection.

The interest at 7.30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a $50 note.
Two cents per day on a $100 note.
Ten cents per day on a $500 note.
Twenty cts. per day on a $1000 note.
One dollar per day on a $5000 note.

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the seven-Thirties already sold, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold coin at 6 per cent., instead of seven and three-tenths in currency. Subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15, at the time when they subscribe.

The slight change made in the conditions of this THIRD SERIES affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The notice of this option payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would so reduce and equalize prices that purchases made with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent. in currency. This is

The Only Loan in Market

Now offered by the Government; and its superior advantages are

Great Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $190,000,000 of the Loan authorized by Congress are now on the market. This amount, at the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the National Banks, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

Allcock's Porous Plasters.

A druggist said the other day, "You have no need to advertise your Porous Plasters; for every one sold certainly causes a dozen to be sold, and a dozen sells a grove, and so on. And you will be able to supply the demand." But we can supply a thousand yards a day.

Affection of the Spine Cured.

Hartford, Conn., Nov. 11, 1861.

Messrs. Thos. Allcock & Co.: Pieces send with dispatch twelve dozen Allcock's Porous Plasters. Our daily demand continues, and they give superior satisfaction. At this moment of writing a man applies for one, who, by entanglements in the shaft of machinery, had both his legs crushed, his arms severely injured, and was for nearly a year entirely helpless. This man found relief very soon by the application of a plaster to his spine. He was soon enabled to work, and now he labors as well as ever. He would cheerfully pay $5 for a single Plaster, if they could not be had at a lower rate. I am surprised that surgeons do not make use of these protected plasters to the exclusion of all others, as their flexibility and adhesiveness are greatly in advance of all other plasters with which I am acquainted, while the perforations peculiar to them render them greatly superior to all others for ordinary surgical uses. Knowing the Plasters to be so useful, I have no scruple that my sentiments should be known.

PURE WATER.
Office of the DIAPHRAGM FILTER of McKENZIE & CO'S plumbing establishment, 35 West Fourth Street, corner of Greene.
The Diaphragm Filter, as an invention, is regarded by the leading plumbers of this city, and generally by professional and scientific gentlemen, as the most simple, durable, and efficient apparatus for the purification of water under pressure. It has been awarded two gold and three silver medals by the American and Maryland Institutes and by the Massachusetts Mechanics Charitable Association, and approved of by our most eminent chemist (with additional improvements).
The Diaphragm Filter, manufactured by ALEXANDER McKENZIE, 909 Fourth St., is the kind of pressure filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. It consists of the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1865.

A PLAIN DANGER.

APPARENTLY we are in some danger of not learning from experience. The spirit of infidelity of popular institutions and of love of liberty in the United States and Government having proved its character and purpose by a war continued with unparalleled ferocity until it failed from sheer exhaustion, it is now gravely proposed that we shall act as if that spirit were no longer dangerous, simply because, for the present, it is exhausted.

Such a theory has no more fatal mistake. Civil war is neither a cure nor a palliative of the spirit from which it springs. The whole training and education of "the South" are what they always were. The dominant class of that section is not less dominant because it is defeated. Its authority is now consecrated in the popular mind of its region by suffering and misfortune. Its haughtiness is supreme. Its hate is unconquerable. It soothes its pride by the conviction that it was only overcome by numbers, and disdainfully awaits the day when it can again try its fortune in the field, or, should that be hopeless, when its sullen passivity of resistance may paralyze all efforts of the Government at reorganization.

Is there any sense in pretending that this is not so? Can there be any folly more signal than that of regarding the feeling of a section as merely the spleen of a few disappointed leaders? How is it always said, and said truly, that the masses of the South were swayed by a dominant class? Do we think they have ceased to be so swayed? Even the Governors provisionally appointed by the United States still speak of "our cause," "our armies," and "the South." Even a paper noted for its "loyal" firmness is impressed for the unconcealed rage and hostility of its tone. We have yet to see in the columns of a single journal, or to hear in the speech of a single orator in the rebel States, the faintest indication of the least fidelity either to the spirit or to the form of the Government of the United States. Governors, regents and editors and orators advise submission to superior force. "We can not help ourselves," is the burden of their strain.

Has any man who has read history or studied human nature any doubt of the inexpressible hatred to this Government which smoulders in the hearts of those whose lips shriek scorn at the oath of allegiance? Let any one who doubts talk with any late rebel, or read the public correspondence from the region lately in rebellion, or the private letters of those who are not slaves of the dominant class, or let him take the testimony of any of our authorities in the South, or compare the editorials written before the close reflect that not one solitary, spontaneous movement of any truly popular or representative body has been made for reorganization through any sincere sympathy with the Government, and he will find some reason to believe that we do not misrepresent the actual condition of affairs. And if by chance some one, or some few, of woman, of that dominant class, standing amidst the total wreck of fortune, in the midst of universal bereavement—homeless and hopeless—should read these words, he would cry, "Yes! thank God, you are right! We hate you and your Government with an undying hatred! We believe your crimes to be colossal, and your guilt not to be described!"

Shall we be told that these are but a disconsolate few? But if they are a few, where are the who are the many? Ten years ago every man who knew any thing in this country of the public situation was perfectly aware of the absolute dismion of division and sympathy, both political and social faith, between the free and slave States. The haughty society that came to the Northern watering-places in the summer, and to the New York hotels in the autumn, mingled chiefly—with notable exceptions—with those who were in obsequious relations to masters or slaves. The great body of representative American society held aloof. This Southern class reviled the American principle, and fiercely protested its devotion to "State rights." It is sickening to remember that swagger after this bloody lapse of four years.

But that class was numerous; it was not small. It represented the wealth, the intelligence, the traditional leadership of its section; and what governs any ignorant multitude but intelligence, wealth, and tradition, when the power of all these forces be paralyzed by the consciousness of a class or a race that such forces have been carefully used to wrong and to ruin? The Southern slave-masters have always controlled the ignorant class of their own color in whose name, as a superior race, they enslaved the colored class. But they could not control human nature. They could not outwit the heart, nor bribe the love of liberty. When the crisis came the master-class carried the overwhelming majority of their own color with them; but their utmost power failed to seduce their slaves. The men who, we are told, have not sense enough to vote with us, had yet sense enough to be true to us against all persuasion of treason. A late letter in the Herald, from Alabama, says that the rebel in that State confess the first labor of blacks to have been a success wherever it was directed by Yankees. "They say if a Southern man takes up a newspaper and reads any thing to a negro, he will not believe a single word of it; but let a Yankee pretend to read, and make up the most improbable lie imaginable, and he will take it for gospel truth." Will any body be kind enough to prove why, if the slaves would not fight with their masters, the freedmen will vote with them?

The degree of faith in State Sovereignty and adhesion to Slavery may have varied, but the white population of the rebel States was practically a unit before the war. It is now practically a unit during the war. Who will deny that it is practically a unit now. No gloving or gilding will hide the fact. No amnesties and kindred "brethren" will help us organize the results of the war any more than it prevented the war. Men whose chief point of honor is consistency of the principle of our common Government are not our political brethren. Men and women who have gloried in the torture of our soldiers for defending that Government are not our social brethren. Their fathers were brethren of our fathers, and their children may be of our children. But the generation that hates to the degree our fall does can hope—however free from vindictive feeling our own hearts may be, and it is a fact that they are absolutely so—to be united to us by social "attraction" in a practical sense than any other enemies.

Any steps at reorganization which disregard these plain facts will be futile. The first step in the true philosophy of our policy is a comprehension of the truth, not a statement of the theory. The possibility that this spirit of hostility may regain control of the Government must be strictly and prevented at whatever cost. If there really be no such possibility so much the better. But that must not be assumed. The first presumption is to mistrust the other way. While there is yet a doubt, the force of the United States should be fully maintained every where. Let freedom of speech and freedom of the press be allowed, but personal freedom be established and defended in the rebel States. Let the whole body of the adult male population be registered and authorized to vote, if you will. Let the forms of a truly free republican Government be secured, but do not commit the fatal fault of intrusting them, without supervision, to those who hate the spirit and the republic. Let the people of the United States retain absolute hold of the whole rebel region until they are thoroughly sure that they will co-operate in good faith with the rest of the country. We believe that the principles of the American system are fully adequate to the perfect pacification of the country. But we are quite as firmly persuaded that the loyal white people of the late rebel States are not strong enough, nor united enough, nor sure of the observance of those principles, and that this can be done only by the power of the whole people.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

SOON after this paper is issued the experiment of laying the Atlantic Telegraph will have been again decided. All the preparations have been consulted and are found most favorable. The season of the year which the shrewdest and most experienced operators declare to be the least stormy has been selected. The largest ship in the world carries the cable. The wire itself has been made under the best superintendence, and tested at every step by the most delicate science. The mere marvel of the enterprise can not be renewed, but the actual public interest in it is in a great and a practical sense. The success of the present effort fail, there will be no fatal disappointment. Should it succeed there will be a general satisfaction at the new advance in good neighborhood and mutual trade.

So immediate and intimate a union of American and Europe must be of quite incalculable advantage to the world. Misunderstanding and nations occasions ignorance, and ignorance begets hostility. If the people of the Southern States, for instance, had had the slightest idea how much we have made war upon the Government, and just in the degree that the people of Europe and America know each other will they be disposed to keep the peace. That is the necessity of modern civilization. The clearer the conflict appears between individual welfare and war, the larger the trading interest will be, and will become. Thus, if the people of the Southern States had believed what ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS told them, they would have preferred his advice to that of RONALD COOKE.

There seems to be some objection to the exclusiveness of the company upon the Great Eastern, and to the privilege which it possesses for conveying messages. But both these matters appear to be peculiarly the business of the company. If the directors choose to have an authentic account of the process of laying the wire, why should any body object? They can obtain the services of as skilful reporters as the newspapers, and they have nothing to gain by "cooking" the reports. And as for the charges, the managers are practical business men. They know the consequences of prohibitory prices, but they also know the immense value of their monopoly if the experiment succeeds. We must believe that they will not invite and secure a popular pressure. They must be assumed to understand how long they may enjoy a monopoly if they manage it wisely. If they do not, they will be the sufferers. If, however, they count upon competition as, in any case, inevitable, they will naturally make hay while the sun shines.

Meanwhile we await patiently the issue of the great experiment. If it fail this time it will be renewed. There are certain things which are sure to be done. If the present resources of science are found to be elements, or by some cause only to be revealed by the experiment, then science will sharpen its resources and gentle the monster with the impeding cause. Faith has no right to despair, but it saw DR. SAUTY muttering and murmuring ever fainter and fainter and disappearing seven years ago at this end of the line, and hears him now reappearing at the other with a fresh cable and renewed hopes and instruments. We can imagine his impatience. We can figure the excellent satellite-vian chafing and fretting for the moment when he can seat himself in the ooze upon the Newfoundland shore and announce to the expectant world "All right.—DE SAUTY."

PETROLIANA.

THE petroleum problem is in a fair way of being solved. Exact records, kept for some three years, enable us to gauge, pretty certainly, the yield of the various wells, and of the great oil district; and while, on the one hand, scientific men are reducing the apparent vagaries of the oil flow to a system governed by fixed laws, Wall Street is forming its judgment on the financial aspect of the subject, and is day by day passing sentence on sham oil companies and letting those stand which have a real value. A couple of years the oil business will have passed out of the domain of speculation, and its prospects and its returns will become as certain as those of the ordinary coal trade.

A work now in the press of MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, "The Oil Regions of Pennsylvania," by Dr. J. P. LESLEY, will probably contain the most exhaustive survey of the great petroleum region that has yet appeared in print. The writer examined every well that has been sunk in the oil region, records the history, product, and present condition of each; studied every method of boring and pumping in use, describes them in detail, criticises each from a scientific as well as from a practical stand-point; collected all the statistics extant on the production of and trade in petroleum, and presents them so intelligently that, with his book in hand, it is easy to generalize, and, within certain limits, to forecast the future of this most important branch of our national production and our national exports.

In the first place, it may be roughly set down as a fact that the yield of Pennsylvania wells is the only region which as yet produces oil in sufficient quantity to enter into general calculations. Oil is produced in Ohio, Virginia, New York, and other States, but as yet the yield of these States is so small, in comparison with that of Pennsylvania, that they need not be considered in a statistical survey of the subject.

Next, the actual product of oil in Pennsylvania is set down at 3,500,000 of barrels of crude oil for the year 1865, worth, taking an average of prices, $15,000,000. This estimate is based on the value of the crude oil at the mouth of the wells. It may thus be said that our product of petroleum is only a quarter as much as our product of wheat, and one-eighth as much as our product of corn or of cotton—taking an average of five years prior to the war as the basis of an estimate of our national cotton crop.

When we try to go further than the facts already ascertained, and to forecast the future, the old mist seems to cloud all reasoning on petroleum again impedes our vision. MR. WRIGHT and other authorities on the subject consider eighteen months the maximum life of a well. Some last longer than this; but the great majority "give out," and refuse to yield, even under the most vigorous pumping, before they are a year old. This may be strictly and successfully, and ever-flowing wells discovered within a few feet of a well which has been exhausted; so that the owner of a productive piece of land may despair as long as he has a square rood of ground unexplored. It may further be remarked that the deepest wells now in operation are but 500 to 600 feet deep, the greatly wells having produced so much oil, and made so many fortunes, were but 300 feet deep. It is now argued by scientific men that the great oil deposits which underlie the earth's surface are not to be reached until a well has been sunk at least 1000 or 1200 feet. This is not the place to discuss the scientific theories which underlie the petroleum belief. Suffice it to say that to many common-sense persons they seem to commend themselves to approval. If they are sound, we shall soon have as many 1200 feet wells as we now have 500 feet wells, and the yield of the past affords no data for gauging the probable yield of the future. Borers for oil have this satisfaction—they cater for a market which can not be glutted. The world will consume, at a price, all the petroleum which can be produced. Europe increased her consumption from 10,000,000 gallons in 1862 to over 30,000,000 gallons in 1864, and will probably use 100,000,000 gallons in 1866 if they can be furnished at a suitable figure. If the oil deposits at 1200 feet depth realize the predictions of professors, Pennsylvania may yet enjoy the proud satisfaction of lubricating and lighting up the world.

To pass from the practical subject of boring in the earth for oil to the consideration of oil stocks as instruments of stock-gambling in Wall Street is an easy descent of Avernus. Yet there are probably many readers of this periodical who are interested in the one as in the other. When, for the punishment of our follies, United States stock, subscribed for at 95 a share, rose to 97, and after falling back to 93 rose again to 830, and paid during a series of months such dividends that it was deemed cheap at the money, and a desirable for investment on any but oil-princes but by sound business men in every branch of trade, and put away with bonds and other "fire-proof" securities, an example was set which has cost a confiding public millions of dollars. It is safe to say that the stock of five hundred petroleum companies is in the market here and at Philadelphia. It is safe to say that of these companies not fifty will give any return at all upon the money invested, and not ten will prove as lucrative investments as yielding moderate-priced railroad bonds or stocks would have proved.

Consider how the thing is done. JONES and BROWN own a piece of land in the petroleum region, with or without a well, for say $10,000. They advance, out of their pockets, $7500 to sink a well. They then organize a company under the admirable general manufacturing law of New York, with a capital of $200,000 (many managers would make it a round million), and transfer to that figure the oil capital is open to public subscription at 50 per cent. See how it works. JONES is President, BROWN Treasurer, and all the little clerks and BROWNS, with a heavy banker or two as decoys (whose stock costs them nothing) are Directors. That $50,000 stock is taken up, a sum of $15,000 is paid in cash, and JONES and BROWN get $17,500 they originally advanced, and leaves $7500 in the treasury to pay salaries. For the $50,000 paid in cash some market value from the subscription of $50,000; and after giving $20,000 thereof to the heavy bankers for the use of their names, JONES and BROWN divide $15,000 between them, which makes both pretty comfortable if a flowing well happens to be struck, and the public happen to fancy the investment.

There are prizes in oil wells as there are in lotteries. But it may safely be assumed that neither in this nor in any other trade will it do to reckon upon exceptional luck. Where the real investment is $25,000 and the nominal investment $250,000 a dividend of one per cent. per annum will be handsome, and a dividend of one per cent. a month may be praise fact set down as fraudulent. Extraordinary luck—as in the case of the United States Company—may lead to extraordinary profits. But for one such case two hundred companies can be mentioned which started with as good prospects as the United States Company, and even when successful it has not yielded any thing beyond good interest on the real investment. The thing is so plain, indeed, that it would hardly be worth while wasting words upon it were it not that the long lists of companies offering stock for subscription in the advertising columns of the papers prove that there must still be gentlemen to be thrown away their money in this oil-gulf.

We say nothing of companies fraudulent on their face. One or two of these concerns are now before the courts, and the public at that the knaves who contrived them will probably escape the Penitentiary. Another company—which we will call the "Hannibal Company" (OF HANNIBAL was a great General too)—has not yet been wound up, or its promoters sent to State Prison. But, patience! The Hannibal of war has come to a capital of nothing. There was a floating rumor that it owned a farm in Kentucky, or a vacant lot in Brooklyn; but nothing was known for certain. The scale was not on the Petroleum Board at $2 a share. The President ordered his broker to buy 100 shares which the Secretary ordered his broker to sell. So a quotation was made. Next day Director A. ordered 100 shares bought at an advance, while Director B. ordered the like lot sold. Day after Director B. was a purchaser, and A. the seller. Then C. and D., also directors, ordered their brokers to buy or sell, as the case was; all the transactions, first to last, being confined to the conspirators, and no outside person having bought or sold a share. Now these are in Wall Street a class of speculators who are called Bears, who are always ready to sell short any stock of which they have a poor opinion. To some of these speculators the conspirators contrived by various ingenious devices to convey the idea that "Hannibal" was in a bad way. Orders to buy were given by officers of the company to speculative brokers, and these orders were canceled again in a great hurry as though the officers had suddenly received bad news. After a time the bait took. Speculators began to sell "Hannibal" short. At first the directors were very obliging. They lent the stock whenever they were asked. But in a short while, when the short line became large enough to spring the trap, they called their stock in, and began to bid up the price. The stock rose in a few days from $2 a share to $32. To say that the operation was a swindle was no consolation to those who had sold that which they hadn't got and couldn't get. Every share of the "Hasnihad" was owned by the original conspirators, and their game was to make money not by horsing for oil, but by horsing for greenbacks in the pockets of the silly Bears of Wall Street.

Readers who want to speculate in oil stocks go to the fountain-head. Club together half a dozen of you, buy a farm, and sink a well. If you don't "strike oil" you will know, at all events, how much you can lose, and you will have the land, at the worst, to grow hay. But the money you pay for oil stocks is like that which you may set down at once as thrown away. Not one in two hundred of you will ever get it back again.

MAKE HASTE SLOWLY.

GENERAL STROTHER, the Adjutant-General of Virginia, is reported to have had an interview lately with the President, in which he said that there might be some foolish old men and worthless young ones left in Virginia, but that the main body of the people were undoubtedly loyal to the Government of the United States and the State of Virginia.

This was an interesting statement. It has not, indeed, been confirmed by a general election in some of the counties, but it doubtless would be at the next election. We wrote on reading it, in an agreeable frame of mind, glad to believe that our apprehensions were incorrect, when lo! upon reaching another column in the same journal, we encountered these remarkable headings: "The Richmond elections. Success of the old rebel candidates. The rebel soldiers do the voting."

It seems that an election had been held in Henrico County, of which the city of Richmond is the county seat, two days before the interesting interview of General STROTHER with the President, and the returns indicated beyond doubt the entire success of the ticket whose candidates and supporters are both still dyed in secession, and who hope by being entrusted with civil power to maintain their treasonable heresies, and again breed war based upon this persistence.... The voting-to-day has been done chiefly by the rebel soldiery of the old Army of Northern Virginia," who are "young and bitter," and were influenced by the late rebel officers and the leading civilians of the exceptedclasses under the amnesty.

How could we expect any thing else? Is it in human nature for the men whom we have forced to surrender by the arms of the United States to turn round and support that Government heartily by their votes? Yet we are not sorry that the election took place. Let it be made as plain as possible to the people of the United States that the reorganization of the rebel States can not be safely intrusted to a special class of the population who are secretly hostile to the Government. That people will then see that if there are not enough truly loyal citizens to organize the States, there will be no harm in waiting. Haste is desirable in the affairs of State; but make haste slowly is a wise maxim.

THE ROPE AND THE RING.

To hang a man at the end of a rope is said to be the worst use you can put him to. But it may certainly be a greater service to society than to suffer him to walk along the same rope stretched over a gulf. If BLONDIN had fallen into the abyss at Niagara the public verdict would have been that he died an ill-fated death. Yet every spectator whose presence encouraged Blondin should have been held an accessory to his death. I think those who by their presence encourage HARRY LESLIE to do what BLONDIN did.

HARRY LESLIE is a follower of the Frenchman's. He walks upon a rope over the Niagara River below the Suspension Bridge, and an enraptured gentleman, having witnessed the edifying feat, proceeds to "put it upon record as one of the grandest feats in funambulism ever attempted." It blew violently. "As it swept through the gorge it seemed as powerful as the noisy waters beneath which gave it echo." Heavy bets were made that LESLIE would not attempt to cross. Foolish bettors! The enraptured gentleman knew that HARRY LESLIE "would make the ascension if any man on earth dare attempt it; and he did do it in magnificent style." "He made his appearance in due time on the American side; was shackled hands and feet with heavy iron chains, with barely freedom to grasp the balance pole in the use of his handpole. His handsome wife and pretty child watched the arrangement of the preliminaries with a genuine anxiety, which was only relieved when he had accomplished his marvelous feat. .....We think every body felt relieved when he concluded his return walk and kissed his wife and baby."

If the law lays its hand upon gentlemen who go to Niagara to risk their lives by pommeling each other, why should it refrain from rounding up a gentleman who risks his life by walking in a high wind on a cord over a roaring gulf? And if the reply be, that the law can not undertake to meddle with fools who choose to throw away their lives, may we inquire why it meddles with fools who choose to have their faces beaten to a jelly? Men are not necessarily killed in a boxing-match nor in walking over a whirlpool upon a rope. The character of the crowd also in both cases is similar. The gentry who assemble to see an "acrobat" walk over the Niagara River are quite as reprehensible in their presence as those who meet to encourage eminent champions of the prize ring. There is no good reason why the ring should be prohibited by a law which tolerates the rope.

NEW JERSEY.

THE Union men of New Jersey have spoken in their convention, and will speak again at the polls, as we believe, in the election of MARCUS L. WARD as Governor. The soldiers of New Jersey, from the Copperhead party forbade to vote because they were fighting for the country, are now at home. They know who has been their faithful and unfaltering friend in the hour whose heart and hand have been always open, and full of sympathy and assistance. They will therefore recognize the true friend of the men of New Jersey the one who would especially be called the soldier's friend is MARCUS L. WARD.

The New Jersey Union platform is strong and sound. It condemns the Copperhead Opposition head influence which has controlled the State, and unreservedly supports the Emancipation Amendment. It reaffirms the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence, and announces that the doctrine that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed is not a "political heresy." The fact is the best principle in national reorganization. In affirming their adhesion to it the Union men of New Jersey place themselves by the side of their brethren in all the other loyal States.

Upon the method of establishing this principle in States where it is denied, and which are to be reorganized on the foundation of it, the resolutions express no opinion. Under the circumstances silence was wise. In a State controlled hitherto by the most violent partisans of parties, and which under that influence rejected the Emancipation Amendment, deliberately choosing to chain itself to a corpse, it is wiser to announce a principle than a policy or a policy. Representatives elected upon a righteous principle are not likely in this emergency to go wrong in practice.

The Union men of New Jersey may be very sure in their canvass of the most earnest sympathy of the friends of liberty, law, and a government founded upon the consent of the governed, throughout the country. Now that the New Jersey soldiers have given their sturdy aid in overthrowing the rebels, let them engage in the same spirit, but with different weapons, upon a similar enemy, the Copperheads at home.

THE FEAST OF SONG.

SPRING brings the birds and the return of peace the singers. The Germans who come to this country fortunately bring with them their tastes, and do not omit to cherish and develop them here; and it is to the Germans that we owe that diffusion of musical knowledge which is becoming universal. The Italian opera remains an exotic, but the German song takes kindly to the soil. The opera is a fashion; but the song is a domestic enjoyment. It is not in the affair of kid gloves, laces, and Champagne. The song is dear to hard hands, to blouses, and linger-hats.

The Chinese feast of lanterns is not so pleasant as the festival of music which the various German vocal societies held in the city of New York a week ago. They came from Philadelphia, from Buffalo, from Albany, from Hartford, from Baltimore, and from many other cities, and devoted the day and night to processions, to concerts, to prize vocal tournaments, to dancing, to sports, to excursions, to jollity. With characteristic geniality the great multitude sang and drank and laughed and played and peacefully parted. There is not the remotest end of a German pleasure-making. Indeed, the German genius for enjoyment transcends that of all other nations. The more we become acquainted with the men we shall enjoy, and the more delightful our enjoyment will be.

The great concert at the Academy was not only delightful by its music, but was very instructive by its manners. There are two parts in a concert—the performing and the hearing. Each is in a great degree responsible for the other. When the performance is poor the attention is wearied; and when the audience is distracted the performance is spoiled. There is a truly fine concert it is unpardonable to whisper and annoy those who, by wishing to hear, have a right to be there, which the whisperer has not. To rise and bustle out before the end and during the concluding performance is as indecent as to flourish out of church during the benediction. "My dear young lady," said an elder dame to a miss, who was giggling and flirting during the performance of one of Beethoven's symphonies, "do not forget that some of us come to hear the music, and not you."

The earnest silence of the listeners at the Academy, the intelligent appreciation, the sincere applause, the mutual respect of singers and hearers, were as instructive as they were unprecedented. The jeweled and perfumed audience of the opera at the Academy would smile at the suggestion that lager-drinking "Dutchers" and "frowzy dowdies" could sit in their seats and teach them manners in an operahouse. But they did it.

It is to remark sympathetic attention of the spectacle. May it be often repeated! May every summer bring the glee-clubs after every spring has brought the choirs of birds!

GOOD SIGN.

WE observe with pleasure that the President is very generally applauding instead of disparaging the officers who have proved their ability and patriotism during the late Administration. By this wise policy the angry excitement of universal office-seeking is allayed, and the animosities that follow universal changes are avoided. More than that, the country secures the services of men who are accustomed to the details of duty, and who have established their fitness for the positions they hold. One of the most important questions in the reorganization of office; and every thing which tends to retain in the public service honest and capable officers is an incalculable advantage. If the great majority of those who hold during good behavior, much of the asperity and corruption of our politics would disappear. The doctrine that "to the victors belong the spoils" is another form of the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. They both spring from the most unscrupulously partisan and immoral conception of popular government.

We remark among the reappointments the name of RICHARD H. DANA, JUN., as District Attorney of Massachusetts. Apparently the President is not alarmed by what one of our excellent but a little hasty neighbors contemptuously calls "Dana-ism," "pronouncing," "dictating," and "sectional" tone of the meeting at which MR. DANA made one of the most forcible, temperate, practical, and conclusive speeches ever heard in Faneuil Hall. The truth is, that at the meeting in question MR. DANA and the other orators expressed their sincere views upon a great public question. That is precisely what the President wishes and the country needs. And if all who differ should imitate a bad example and fail to abusing each other, how should we be any nearer the solution of the questions before us?

POLTROONERY.

IT is curious to observe how incredulous is poltroonery. When the Southern leaders were planning the rebellion and preparing to strike at the Union and Government, there was a class of persons and papers in the Free States which was constantly denouncing the "alarmists, croakers and radicals of the North" as exasperating such lambs as DAVIS, SLIDELL, WIGFALL, MASON, and the rest, and goading even those mild and forbearing gentlemen into rebellion. Of course when the lambs were ready and attacked the Government, the same lick-spittles declared that the "wicked" rebels at the North were the guilty party, and that the poor erring lambs were greatly to be pitied and forgiven. Now that their attack is abortive and the States are all in the power of their own old truculent enemy up again, and inform us that "the radical revolutionary faction and secessionists of the North" are at the end of their rope. They are abusing their Southern lambs again. They compelled them to try to get out of the Union, and now they are trying to prevent the innocents from getting in. Of course the fate of the "Northern incendiaries" could be silenced we should hear the soft coo of secession doves and the plaintive bleat of rebel sheep.

Doubtless the people of the loyal free States have much to answer for. But is it not just possible that their accusers who made war upon the country to save slavery are not altogether guiltless? Or, indeed, is it only your shivering poltroon who thinks each side equally guilty and naughty. "Good Lord! Good Devil!" who is truly pious?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE SITUATION.

THE political situation presents many grave problems. The reorganization of the civil power of the Southern States for delegates to the several State Conventions. It is expected that the Union sentiment in Virginia has received favorably to secession candidates. It is difficult to see how this can be the case under the conditions imposed upon the voters, and reports of this nature are not to be relied upon until proved. Yet there is only too much ground for apprehension that in many districts the old secession element may be able to control, by the measure of their former influence. In Tennessee Governor BROWNLOW is taking the same line as his head, much to the delight of his Copperhead opponents. The Governor is determined that the laws in regard to the election shall be executed at all hazards. His task is a difficult one. The candidates for Congress are addressing the voters in different parts of the State, the secessionists in their speeches impudently denouncing both the National and State Governments. In addition to the trouble of political agitation, the Governor has to contend against the fact that the country is still infested by bands of guerrilla robbers.

Provisional Governors of South Carolina, has prepared and forwarded to his State from Washington a proclamation appointing an election to be held on the 6th of November next to choose delegates to the State Convention, which is to assemble on the 20th of the same month.

Governor PARSONS, of Alabama, has issued his proclamation announcing the inauguration of measures for the restoration of civil government in that State. The 21st of August is the day appointed for the election of delegates to the State Convention, which is to assemble on the 15th of September. The greater portion of the country and town officers who, under the rebel régime, were elected on the 2d of May last, when rebel authority ceased, are reappointed. The Governor will himself act as Judge during the continuance of the provisional government. Such officers will proceed to take the oath of allegiance to the National Government, and to give new bonds for the performance of their duties. The Governor appeals to the present condition of the South and the ruin and suffering which have been caused, but thinks that there is hope notwithstanding this they have to-day every political right which they possessed before the war, including the right to hold slaves; and slavery, he tells them, is irrecoverably gone, and it is the part of wisdom to make the best they can of the new order of things. Governor PARSONS estimates that 125,000 Alabamians escaped in the war, of which 70,000 are dead or disabled.

Governor JOHNSON, of Georgia, has also issued his proclamation calling a State convention and appointing a day for electing delegates thereto. The election will be held on the 4th of October, and the convention will assemble in Milledgeville on the 25th of the same month.

General PALMER, military commander in Kentucky, has issued an order giving freedom and equal legal rights to all the slaves who will leave the State, and a great exodus of these people to the north side of the Ohio River is in progress.

NEWS ITEMS.

There have been received at Fortress Monroe, during the past two weeks, 193 iron guns, late the property of the rebels, and mounted on the upper line of fortifications at Richmond. There guns are all of large calibre, ranging from 32 to 100 pounders. The latest arrivals were taken from Fort Darling. They are of rebel manufacture, and of the best, having been cast in 1864.

The Paymaster-General Ordnance the following newspaper statements:—The sum of sixteen dollars, late Confederate, (Va.) currency, was ordered by Secretary Stanton: General Ord, in command of the Army of the James, has issued an order prohibiting the sale of cider. General Grant interfered, and the arrest was stayed. The Secretary of War says the whole matter is absurd. No such order was ever issued; and, had it been issued, the order would have been void. The Secretary of War finds in the order itself the inference that it declined to obey an order because it thought it unpleasant to obey it. Major-General Doubleday, is astounded in fact and principle, a severe and unjust criticism upon the act of Congress. The same Secretary Stanton:

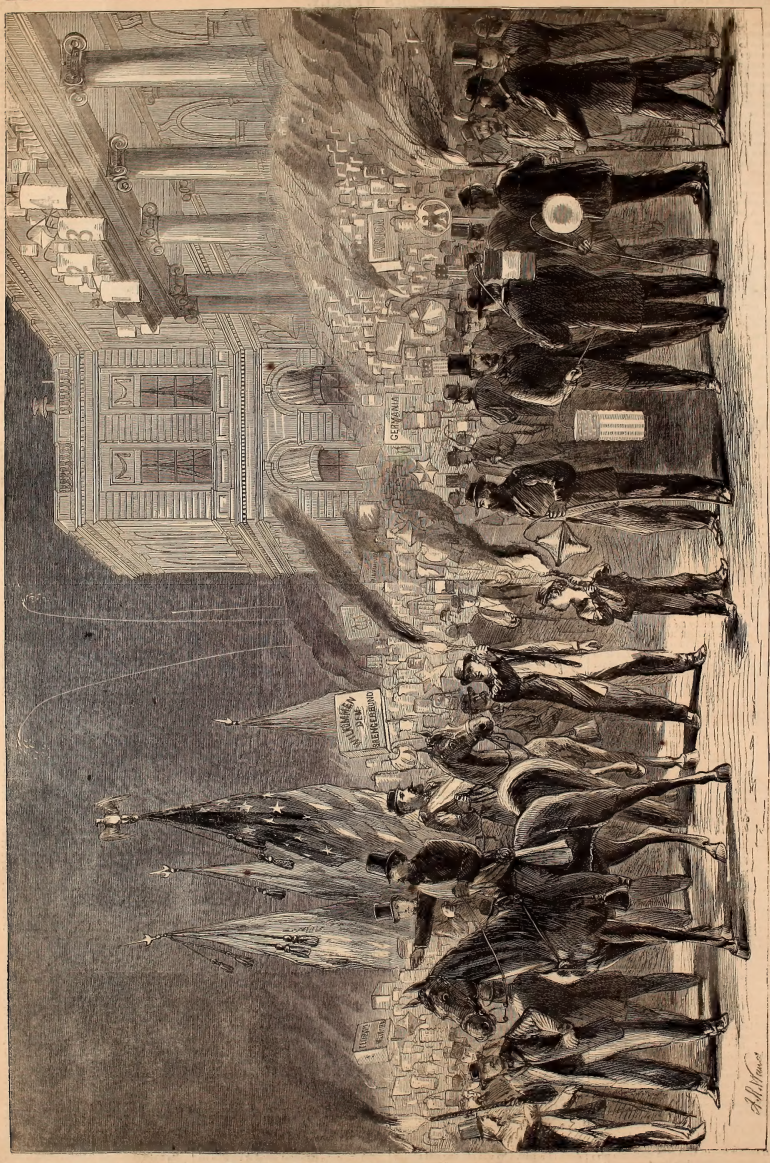
The Board Preliminary building at Washington is to be pulled down. The prisoners have been removed to the Old Capitol Prison.

Major-General Parker assumed command of the Department of the East, head-quarters at New York, on the 10th of July.

Major Hall, commanding at San Francisco, has made public the sentence of the military commission in the case of the rebel pirates arrested last year in the Pacific Ocean, by order of Secretary Seward, on the charge of attempting to capture the American steamer Commodore, running between San Francisco and Portland, Oregon. They were found guilty and sentenced to be hanged, but Judge Advocate M'Donald recommended to the President to imprisonment for life in the cases of the leaders, and to imprisonment in the case of the remainder.

On the 30th of May last, when the disbanding of our armies was completed, up to and inclusive of the 1st of July, one hundred and eight thousand soldiers were sent from Washington to their homes in the loyal States.



The Secretary of the Navy has directed the reduction of the Atlantic squadron to ten vessels and the Pacific squadron to five.

The Secretary of War has declared null and void all the sentences of military and military commanders in the South imposing restraints or punishments for the exercise by freedmen to which the white citizens are not subjected.

He has been charged against that Secretary Stanton that the latter would allow Mrs. Surratt no spiritual aid or consolation of any kind, and that this action should add to the severity of opinion as to the prisoner's sentence. On the 20th of July, Rev. Abel Hurd published a full and explicit statement proving that every item of the charge was a falsehood. Secretary Stanton and Hon. Horatio Seymour, the Secretary of War expressly and readily assented to the request of Mrs. Surratt's counsel to have a priest with her as condition as to any conviction of the clergyman as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and that he might say on the subject." Now Father Walter's letter and statement are proposed for publication to prove with the intention of refuting General Hardie. Father Walter's statement is published in full, and proves the entire falsity of the charge.

THE CASTAWAY.

On either hand is the wide, wide sea,
And high overhead the deep blue sky,
And clinging fast to a broken mast
Is one who searches with eager eye
Over the ocean deep and vast.

The sun climbs up to his highest noon
And gazes down from his dizzy height;
The tall waves dance in his terrible glance,
And sparkle and flash with a dazzling light,
Like the sheen on a burnished lance.

After in the distance the white sails shine
And seem for a time to draw more near,
Making his boast with a wild throb inside,
Then leave a pang as they disappear,
Like the sting of a poisoned dart.

Down to his bower in the distant west,
Hour after hour the hot sun slopes,
And the shadowy night veils the lingering light;
And heavy as lead grow the castaway's hopes
As the day fades out to his sight.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE RICH MISS HATHERTON.

An evening party at Castletowers was a momentous affair. It involved a good deal of expense and a certain amount of anxiety; for the hereditary coffers were ever but scantily furnished, and the hereditary hospitality had to be kept up at any cost. How some of Lady Castletowers' few but elegant entertainments were paid for was a question never to be put to her son and heir. Sometimes an oak or two was felled in some remote corner of the park; or the Earl denied himself a horse; or the carriage was left unrenovated for half a year longer; or her ladyship magnanimously sacrificed her own best shot-bird to the table in season. Any how, these extra expenses were certain to be honorably met in such a manner that only the givers of the feast were inconvenienced by it.

On the present occasion, however, Lord Castletowers had been compelled to apply to his solicitor for an advance upon his next half-yearly receipts; and when William Trefalden went down that Thursday morning to see his cousin Saxon he brought with him a check for the Earl. The party was fixed for the following evening; but Mr. Trefalden could not be prevailed upon to stay for it. He was obliged, he said, to go back to town that same night by the last train; and he did go after making himself very pleasant (pleasant at dinner) with Saxon's signature in his pocket-book.

It was a very brilliant party, consisting for the most part of county magnates, with a sprinkling of military, and a valuable reinforcement of dancing men from town. Among the latter magnates were Viscount and Lady Esher, a stately couple of the old school, who, being much too dignified to be raved by, raved over with four horses from Esher Court, a distance of eighteen miles, and remained at Castletowers for the night. The Viscount was lord lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county, and had once held office for three weeks as President of the Board of Perquisites; a fact to which he was never weary of alluding. There, too, were Sir Alexander and Lady Hatherton, with their five unmarriageable daughters; the Bishop of Betchworth and Mrs. Bunyon; Mr. Walkingshaw, of Aylsham, one of the richest commoners in England, with Lady Arabella Walkingshaw, his wife, and their distinguished guest, Miss Hatherton, of Penzance, whose father had begun life as a common sailor, and ended it with a fortune of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds. These, together with Lord Dorchester, the responsibility Prince Quarts Pots, the Prussian Envoy; a few local baronets and their families; the ex-secretary of legation; and a number of lesser stars, parliamentary, clerical, and official, made up the bulk of the assembly. There were also three or four notabilities from the lower paradises of arts and letters—Sir Jones de Robinson, the eminent portrait painter; Mr. Sandy Augustin, the great Italian violinist; Mr. Smythe Browne, the profound author of "Transcendental Eclecticism," and Mrs. Sperry Sperry, who wrote fascinating books on "Woman in the Camp, the Council, and the Church"—a very remarkable couple, whose distinguishing characteristics were that Mrs. Smythe Browne wore short hair and shirt-collars, while Mrs. Sperry Sperry let Mr. Smythe Browne hand upon his shoulders, and he displayed no vestige of linen whatsoever.

By nine o'clock the guests began to arrive. By ten the reception-rooms were well filled, and dancing commenced in the great hall. Though rarely thrown open to the light of day, the great hall, with its panelings of dark oak, its carved chimney-piece, its Gothic rafters, and its stands of rusty armor, some of which dated back to the field of Agincourt, was the glory of Castletowers. Brilliantly lighted, decorated with evergreens and flowers, and echoing to the music of a military band, it made such a hall-room as one might vainly seek in any country but our own.

Lady Castletowers received her guests near the door of the first reception-room, looking very stately, and more like Marie Antoinette than ever, in her glitter of old family diamonds. Gracious to all, as a hostess should be, she nevertheless apportioned her civilities according to a complex code of etiquette. The smile with which she greeted Viscount Esher differed by many degrees from that with which she received Sir Jones de Robinson; and the hand extended to Mrs. Smythe Browne was as the hand of an automaton compared with that which met, with a pressure slight yet cordial, the palm of the rich Miss Hatherton.

"But where is the noble savage?" said this latter, surveying the room through her double eye-glass. "I have heard so much about him, my dear Lady Castletowers, and I am dying to see him!"

Miss Hatherton was a tall, handsome young woman of about five and-twenty, with black eyes, white teeth, a somewhat large, good-natured mouth, and a very decisive manner. She made one of a little privileged knot that was posted behind Lady Castletowers; and amused herself by criticising the guests as they came up the stairs.

"The noble savage!" repeated Lady Castletowers. "Whom can you mean, Miss Hatherton?"

"Whom should I mean but this young man who has inherited the famous legacy?"

"Mr. Trefalden? Oh, he was here but a few moments ago. There he stands, by the fireplace."

"The Antinous with the golden curls? But, my dear Lady Castletowers, he's absolutely beautiful! And he doesn't look savage at all. I had expected to see a second Byron—a creature clothed in raiment of camel's hair, or the skins of wild beasts. I declare I am quite disarmed."

"Mr. Trefalden is a very pleasant person," said Lady Castletowers, with a faint smile. "And very much admired."

"Is he indeed? Pleasant and unassuming—dear me, how very charming! And so rich, too! Why, his moderate patrimony, I am told, I used to think myself above the reach of want at one time, but I feel like a pauper beside him. Who is his sister person who is going up the stairs, covered with as many stars as the celestial globe?"

But before Lady Castletowers could reply, the name of His Responsibility, Prince Quartz Pots, was thundered forth by the groom of the chambers, and the Prince himself was heralding profoundly over the fair hand of his hostess.

"What a funny little man it is!" said the heiress, in a loud way, looking after His Responsibility through her glass, as he passed on toward the adjoining room.

His Highness Quartz Pots, my dear Miss Hatherton, is a highly distinguished person," said Lady Castletowers, coldly.

"Oh yes—I know he is."

"He is distantly connected through his maternal grandmother with the Margravine of Saxe Hohenhausen, with our own Royal Family; and the present Grand Duchess of Zollenstrasse is his third cousin once removed."

Miss Hatherton did not seem to be at all impressed by these facts.

"Ah, indeed," was all she said, indifferently. "And this fine man with a head like a lion—who is he?"

"Mr. Thompson, the member for Silvermere," replied Lady Castletowers, when the gentleman had made his bow and drifted on with the throng.

"What, the great Thompson? the Thompson who initiated the famous inquiry into the abuses of the Perquisite Office?"

"I do not know what you imply by 'great,' my dear Miss Hatherton," said her ladyship, coldly; "but I believe Mr. Thompson's politics are very objectionable."

"Ah, I see you don't like him; but I shall implore you to introduce me, notwithstanding. I have no politics at all, and I admire talent wherever I find it. Dear me, how he does stare while, I have lost my heart to Antinous, and am longing to dance with him. Do pray make us known, dear Lady Castletowers."

"Upon whom does Miss Hatherton desire to confer the honor of dancing?" asked Lord Castletowers, who happened to come by at the moment. "Can I be of any service?"

"Yes, papa, you can," said Lucy, addressed to this Mr. Trefalden, about whom all the world has been talking for the last five or six weeks."

"I—I don't know that I am aware, my dear. Will you allow me to hand you to a seat while I go in search of him?"

"Thank you, but be sure you make him dance with me, Lord Castletowers—I want to dance with him above all things. He can dance, I suppose?"

"Of course. How can you ask such a question?"

"Because I have been told that he was a perfect wild man of the woods before he inherited his fortune—couldn't write his name, in fact, and never danced and had never seen a sovereign in his life."

"I just mean that he has not yet been presented at St. James's, you are probably right," replied the Earl, smiling.

"What, then, Lord Castletowers? How shocking! I did not believe you capable of such an enormity. But do pray tell me a little more about your ward; for I know he has a very heard plenty of fiction. Was he not really a barbarian, after all?"

"No more than I am."

"Is it possible?"

"Nor is that all. Saxon Trefalden has plenty of solid learning under those yellow locks of his," Miss Hatherton. He speaks French, Italian, and German with equal facility; he is a fortunate mathematician; and as for his Greek and Latin scholarship, I have known nothing like it since I bade farewell to the dear old professors at Magdalen College."

"Well, you surprise me very much," said Miss Hatherton, "and I can not deny that I'm disappointed. I had far rather he had been a barbarian, you know. It would have been so very delicious!"

"Perhaps, then, you will be consoled by finding him as unsophisticated as a child. But you shall judge for yourself."

And with this the Earl installed Miss Hatherton in an easy-chair, and went in search of Saxon. The heiress immediately turned to her nearest neighbor, who happened to be the Bishop of Betchworth, and began a conversation. It was Miss Hatherton's way to be always talking—and somewhat loudly, too.

"What have I done, my lord," said she, "that you should never come to me this evening? I have a thousand questions to ask you. I want to know how the renovations are going on—and I am really to have a stained oriel, after all. And what are you going to do about that grand carved old screen? I have been told it is dangerous, and can not be possibly be put up again. I hope that's not true."

"I am happy to say that it is not," replied the bishop, "and that very handsome man, who is much admired by the ladies of his diocese. "I believe we shall be able to restore the worst parts, and that it will keep its old place for the next two or three centuries. About the east window I am less sanguine."

"Why so?" asked the heiress.

"I fear we can not afford it."

"But how is that? I thought there was a large surplus fund in hand."

"There was; but we have found since then that the pipes are in much worse state than we had at first supposed; and to put it into thorough repair will swallow up the whole of our available money."

"Dear, dear, I'm so sorry!" said the heiress. "You really want the stained window. One misses the sunlight terribly in Betchworth Cathedral. How much would it cost?"

"More than we could hope to raise after the liberal subscriptions we have granted. A thousand pounds."

"So large a sum? Ah, bishop, if I were one of your flock I should ask leave to put that window in. However, if you like to open a fresh list, you may put me down for two hundred and fifty."

"My dear lady," said the prelate, "what can I say in acknowledgment of such munificence?"

"Only, I beg, that you will try to get the rest of the thousand as quickly as you can. But here comes my cousin."

And Miss Hatherton turned to Lord Castletowers, who had found and captured Saxon, and now stood with him near her chair.

"Will you permit my friend Mr. Trefalden the pleasure of dancing with you, Miss Hatherton?" said he.

"I am delighted to make Mr. Trefalden's acquaintance, and shall be most happy to dance with him," replied the heiress, putting out her hand as cordially and unceremoniously as if Saxon were an old friend already. "What are you doing in the hall now, Lord Castletowers?"

"Finishing a walk—which will be followed by a quadrille."

"Then we shall be just in time for the quadrille. Won't you find us a pleasant vis-à-vis?"

"Will you accept me, if I can find a partner?"

"Delightful! Bishop, we must have another moment's chat with you in the close of the evening."

Saying which Miss Hatherton gathered her ample skirts together, took Saxon's proffered arm, and swept majestically to the room and down the wide old stairs in a very stately fashion.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE HOSPITALER'S GATE.

Mr. Reckwitch sat alone in a little private parlor at the back of the house of the Hospitaler's Gate tavern, with a bottle of brown sherry and a couple of glasses before him, waiting patiently for the arrival of the very tip of the host his employer spent at Castletowers; but he had not, therefore, left Chancery Lane over five minutes before dinner, or during any detail of his regular work. He had, on the contrary, seen his fellow-clerks off the premises, and locked up the office safe, before he allowed himself to remember that for Abel Reckwitch was such a highly respectable man that he would not on any account dine before the usual hour of Mr. Trefalden's absence. He was waiting, as he had just told the "young lady" who presided at the bar-tap, to light his cheroot, and to drink a glass of sherry with a friend. It was about eight o'clock in the evening, and although the sun was not yet down, and with dusk, the gas was already lighted; for the Hospitaler's Gate was a queer, old-fashioned, shut-in place, and the twilight always began there at least a point of getting away from it as early as possible. There was, however, a bright fire burning in the grate, and the bar parlor looked all alive with comforters. The tops of the great yellow pinchbeens and the lacquered gas-burners were visible above the blind that screened the half-glass door of the parlor; and now and then some privileged customer would peep over, stare at the back of Mr. Reckewitch's head, and disappear. But this clerk sat, all unconscious, gazing placidly at the fire, and never once looked round.

But for the brisk wrangle going on within the precincts of the Gate itself the place would have been singularly quiet. The people by just the Hospitaler's Gate. Sometimes a cab drove up; sometimes a cart rumbled past, but not often. The great current of traffic flowed wide by, along a neighboring thoroughfare, and was hoarsely audible, like the dull roar of a heavy sea; but the Hospitaler's Gate stood apart, gray and hoary, and stored with strange old memories, spanning the shabby by-street with its battlemented arch, and echoing, in a ghostly way, to the merriment below.

Standing in the very heart of the City, within a few yards of Smithfield Market, and in the midst of the overcrowded parish of Clerkenwell, this rare old medieval fragment was scarcely known even by name to the majority of Londoners. To the Smithfield drover, the cattle-salesman, the purchaser of Christmas beef, and the watchmaking population in general, it was a familiar spot. Archæologists knew of its whereabouts, and held occasional meetings in the oak room over the gateway, at which they talked learnedly of Jordan Brise, the patriarch Heraclius, Thomas Docwray, Stow, and King Harry the Eighth; and others who collected their dry discussions with rare old port from cellars that had once held good store of mailsend malt sack. But the gay young knights are dreaming. Literary men remembered it as the cradle of the Gentleman's Magazine, and as the place where Samuel Johnson, in his rags and his pride, ate his dinner behind a screen, like a dog fed from its master's table. But these were pretty nearly all who knew or cared about the Hospitaler's Gate. Hundreds of intelligent Londoners passed within fifty yards of it every day of their lives, ignorant of its very existence. Of the dwellers to the west of Temple Bar not one in a thousand knew that scarcely a stone's-throw from the Charter House walls there yet stood some portion of a far more venerable religious foundation, begun in the last year of the eleventh century, and linked with many strange and stirring episodes of English history. Even so true a lover of the past and of picturesque as Leigh Hunt passed it by in his pleasant memories of the town without a word.

But Mr. Reckwitch was thinking neither of the good Knights Hospitalers, nor of Dr. Johnson, nor of any thing nor any one just then, saving and excepting a certain Mr. Ebenezer Kidd, who had promised to meet him there about seven, and who that Thursday evening. And Mr. Kidd was late.

The clock in the bar had struck eight long ago, the bells of St. John's Church had by and struck a quarter past, and then half past, and still Mr. Kidd was not forthcoming. The head clerk looked at his watch, sighed, shook his head, poured out a glass of the brown sherry, and drank it contemplatively. Before he had finished the glass he commenced it a second in the bar, and a noisy hand upon the latch of the glass door, announced his friend's arrival.

Mr. Ebenezer Kidd—a tall, florid, good-humored-looking fellow, with a frank laugh, a loud cheery voice, and a magnificent pair of red whiskers—was a practiced observer, noting his white hat, his showy watchguard, his free and easy bearing, would have pronounced him at first sight to be a commercial traveler, but at the practiced observer would for once have been wrong.

"Sorry to have kept you waiting, Mr. Reckwitch," said he, nodding familiarly to his entertainer, and then he went to the mirror over the fire, and helping himself at once to a glass of wine. "Not my fault, I assure you. Sherry, I see—Capital sherry. Don't know a better cellar in London, and that's saying something."

"I'm very glad you have been able to look in, Mr. Kidd," said the head clerk, deferentially.

"I was particularly anxious to see you."

Mr. Kidd laughed, and helped himself to a second glass.

"It's one of the peculiarities of my profession, Mr. Reckwitch," said he, "that I find the world divided into two classes of people—those who are particularly anxious to see me, and those who are particularly anxious not to see me. Uncommon good sherry, and no mistake!"

Mr. Kidd glanced toward the glass door, edged his chair a little nearer to that of his guest, and said, huskily:

"Time, and time, Mr. Kidd, to think over that little matter we were speaking about the other day?"

"That little matter?" repeated Mr. Kidd, in the same loud, off-hand way as before. "Oh, yes—I've not forgotten it."

He drained the filling his glass for the third time, and holding it in a knowing fashion between his eye and the lamp. The head clerk looked at him for two minutes, and looking forward with his two fat hands upon his knees, ejaculated:

"Well?"

"Well, Mr. Reckwitch?"

"What is your opinion?"

Mr. Kidd emptied off the third glass, leaned back in his chair, and, with a smile of delightful candor, said:

"Well, Sir, to be plain with you, I can give no opinion till you and I understand each other a little better."

Mr. Reckwitch breathed hard.

"What do you mean, Mr. Kidd?" said he. "Haven't I spoken plainly enough to understood?"

Mr. Kidd pushed his glass away, thrust his hands into his pockets, and became suddenly grave and business-like.

"Well, Sir," replied he, dropping his noisy voice and jovial smile as if they had been a costume and mask, "this, you see, is an unusual case. It's a sort of case we're not accustomed to. We don't go into things without a motive, and you've given us no motive in point."

The clerk's face darkened.

"I don't quite follow you," said he, "that I want information, and am willing to pay for it?"

"Why, no, Mr. Reckwitch—not quite. We must be satisfied of the use you will make of that information."

"And suppoin' I don't want to make use of it at all?"

"Then, Sir, I'm afraid we can't help you. We are not spies; we are a legal force. Our business is to promote the ends of justice—not to serve private curiosity."

Mr. Reckwitch looked down, silent, baffled, perplexed.

"I should have thought," said he, "that the mere fact of any professional man's keepin' his home and his ways so deadly secret would be motive enough for inquiry. Where there's mystery there's safe to be something wrong. People ain't so close when they've nothin' to hide."

"Some folks are eccentric, you know, Mr. Kockwitch."

"It ain't eccentricity," replied the clerk, promptly.

"What then?"

"I can't say. I may have my suspicions; and my suspicions may be right, or may be wrong. Any how, one can't see far in the dark."

"No, that's true," replied Mr. Kidd.

"If I was a man from the address I'd be satisfied," added Kockwitch, staring hard at the fire.

"Now, I tell you what it is, Sir," said the other, "we must have your motive. Why do you want to know a certain person's address? What is it to you where he lives or how he lives?"

"It is a great deal to me," replied Mr. Kockwitch. "I'm a respectable man, and I don't choose to work under any but a respectable employer."

Mr. Kidd nodded, and caressed the red whiskers.

"If, as I suspect, there's somethin' wrong somewhere," the clerk went on to say, "I don't want to be mixed up in it when the day of reck'nin' comes round."

"Of course not."

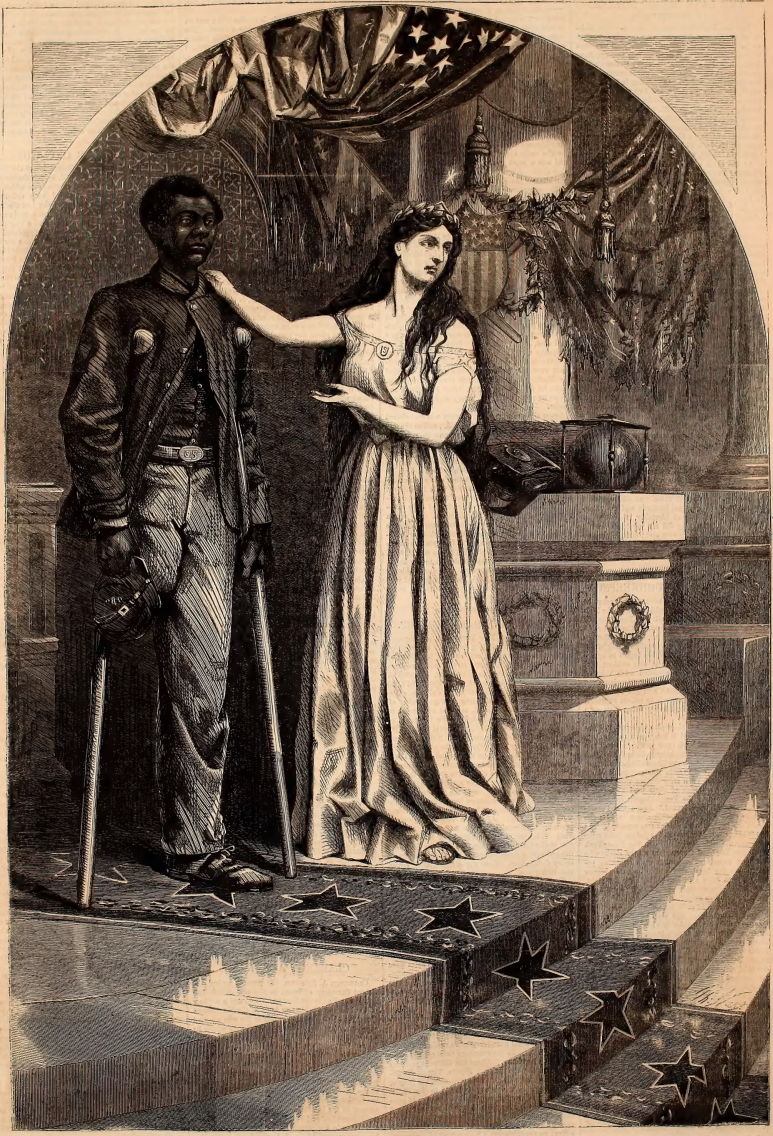
"And there's my motive."

"Have you always been on good terms, Mr. Kockwitch, with the party in question?"

This was said very sharply and suddenly, but the clerk's face remained solid and inexpressive as ever.

"Well, Mr. Kidd," said he, "I can't say there's ever been much love lost between us. I've done my duty, and I don't deny that he's done his; but we've been neither friends nor enemies."

Mr. Kidd stared hard at Mr. Kockwitch, and Mr. Kockwitch stared at the fire; so one, on scrutiny, on the other all unconsciousness. For some minutes both were silent, and the loud hirth at his chair-back became distinctly audible. Then Mr. Kidd drew a deep breath, pushed his chair back with the air of one who arrives at a sudden resolution, drew a slip of paper from his waistcoat pocket, and said:



"Well, Sir, if the address is all you require, here it is."

The steely light so rarely seen there flashed into Abel Kockwitch's eyes, and his hand closed on the paper as he had been a tiger-cat trying to fly away. He did not even look at it, but imprisoned it at once in a plethoric pocket-book with a business card case that stopped like a handcuff.

PARDON.

Columbia.—"Shall I trust these men,

FRANCHISE.

AND NOT THIS MAN?"

THE LATE BISHOP POTTER,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

THE late Right Reverend ALONZO POTTER, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Pennsylvania, died at San Francisco July 4. Bishop POTTER was born in the town of Beekman, Dutchess County, New York, July 10, 1800. He entered Union College at the age of fourteen, with a view to entering upon the clerical profession. Graduating in 1818, he the next year became a tutor, and two years later was chosen Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy. This was in 1821. During this year he was ordained to the diaconate, and in August, 1824, he took presbyter's orders. In 1825 he was elected President of Union College, but declined the appointment. In 1826 he became rector of St. Paul's Church in Boston, where he remained for five years.

At the end of his connection with St. Paul's Professor POTTER was elected to fill the chair of Moral Philosophy in Union College, which he held until his ascension to the Bishopric of Pennsylvania in 1845. President NOTT was his father-in-law, and Mr. POTTER, as Vice-President of the College, relieved the former of a great measure of his professional burdens.

When Bishop ONDERDONK, in 1845, was deposed, Professor POTTER was elected to the vacant diocese. The duties of this new office were performed with fidelity and dignity. His qualifications especially interested himself in the education of the ministry.

Bishop POTTER was twice married. His first wife, the daughter of Doctor ELIPHALET NOTT, died several years ago. He had married again this year, and was on his marriage tour in search of California, from which he never returned. Bishop POTTER had a brother, the Right Reverend ELIPHALET POTTER, who is Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of New York. Bishop ALONZO POTTER's contributions to literature have been valuable. He has published a work entitled "The Principle of Science applied to the Domestic and Mechanic Arts;" also has elaborated work on "Political Economy;" and in 1847 the "Hand-Book for Readers and Students," which had a wide circulation. Several volumes of his sermons have been widely read among the members of the Episcopal Church. He also assisted in the preparation of a work—"The School and the Schoolmaster"—a copy of which was placed in the district school libraries of this State, and had a mighty influence in the elevation of the standard of our common schools, which has not ceased to be felt to this day. He was a vigorous writer, and was of the most eloquent pulpit orators in America. Bishop POTTER was distinguished from many of his episcopal brethren, and even from his brother, by his great liberality of religious views. His ideas of Christianity did not limit him within the narrow bounds of his own sect; and previous to his elevation to the bishopric it was a common thing for him to officiate in Methodist and other pulpits.

BOAT-RACE AT POUGHKEEPSIE.

NO affair of the kind has occurred for years so disgraceful as the race at Poughkeepsie on the 18th of July between the New York and Poughkeepsie crews. Both crews were known as the best amateur men in the country, and had made every effort to bring themselves into the most perfect condition for the race. When the conveyances had arrived on the course on the morning of the 18th it was evident that Poughkeepsie was to be crowded with thieves, gamblers, and pickpockets. These characters were in possession of the restaurants, and got up disturbances which occasioned crowds to collect together, when the pickpockets had every thing their own way.

The boat-race began about five o'clock P.M. The whole proceeding is said to have been unfair from the outset, the New York crew getting at least two lengths start of the Poughkeepsie boat-load of men was fairly given. But notwithstanding this it soon appeared that Poughkeepsie was gaining on New York. The New York crew sought foul, it is reported, took advantage of their lead and pulled across the bows of the Poughkeepsie, compelling the latter to slacken speed. Again the Poughkeepsie crew gained, and were about to pass the New York boat, when the trick was repeated. The whole scene was apparent to the judges, who were anxious to decide fairly. When the New York boat came in ahead the rowdies of the crowd had had been amusing themselves with knocking policemen in the head, and indiscriminate plunder and violence, after a furious yell of triumph arose. The judges immediately sought to hide from the crowd where they might decide the race fairly, but in vain. They had only time to enter the Bishop Keepsie House, when the crowd, having busted down the different stakeholders and taken the money from them with pistols levelled, the judges rushed upon the judges, and threatened them with instant death if they did not give "the New York fellows" their money. The decision was given under this violent compulsion, and the ruffians, having finished their little business, returned to their miscellaneous row. The military had just been called out when fifteen car-loads of the rascals left for New York.

Scenes of this sort are coming to be of daily occurrence and must be stopped. On the morning of the 20th a gang of ruffians broke through the gate of the Roosevelt Street Ferry-House, refusing to pay, and when the ferry-master brought men to his assistance the gang set upon them with clubs, bars, and beat several of them, as well as some of the police. Three or four persons were dangerously wounded. It is not long since at a firemen's picnic at Glen Cove a similar disturbance occurred. Certain it is that violence is getting the ascendency, and will continue to increase until some effectual punishment be inflicted upon these disturbers of the public peace.

It is not our intention to convey the impression that the New York boat's crew was at all responsible for the riot at Poughkeepsie. As to the unfairness of the race that has been disputed. We have given the report as it came to us. The whole affair seems to have been injudiciously managed. It is said that the civil authorities at Poughkeepsie were warned of the raid which was to be made. If so, it is very evident that they took very inefficient measures to prevent the disturbance.

THE LATE Rev. NEWTON HESTON.

Rev. NEWTON HESTON, whose portrait we give on our first page, was born in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., November 30, 1823, of Quaker parentage. He received only a common school education, but he often took occasion to speak, in his sermons and in his addresses to children, of his father and mother. At the early age of fourteen years he left school, and was a pupil in no institution of learning after that time. About this time, through the religious influence of the Rev. Abraham Souder, he was led to the acceptance of Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and became a member of the Union Methodist Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. The leaving school he became a clerk in a book-store, where he remained for two years, and then entered the store of a company engaged in the tea trade. During his clerkships he prosecuted his studies diligently. He often felt drawn to the ministry, but loved commercial pursuits, and because of his energy and unusual business talent was offered lucrative positions. In his retirement among the mountains he likens he determined that if his life was spared he would devote it to the preaching of the Gospel. He was licensed as an exhorter at the early age of seventeen years, and so acceptably exercised his gift that he was soon placed in charge of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Allentown, Pennsylvania. It was a hard spot, in a community where threats and not sympathy were the reward of fidelity. A successful revival crowned his efforts, and to his appointment over many such. At this period he visited the Marine Church, Jacksonville, Fla., where he there he was known as the "Boy Preacher," and where he preached nearly every night for thirteen weeks.

Some six years ago Mr. HESTON was transferred from Philadelphia to Newark, N. J.; and at the end of two years, desiring a change, accepted a call from the State Street Congregational Church, Brooklyn, New York, where he preached his last sermon as pastor on the Sabbath, the 5th November, 1864. How faithfully he fulfilled his trust is indicated by the fact that a heavy and already burdened debt of $30,000 has been assumed all in arrears, has been reduced to moderate proportions, and an active membership of only fifty-seven has increased to four hundred. He was a "live" man. Every enterprise connected with the church in which he engaged prospered. Mr. HESTON also took strong grounds in his opinions at the outbreak of the Great Rebellion for its suppression, and performed a very important work in the great public meetings of that period. He died suddenly on Thursday, July 13, 1865, leaving a beloved wife and three children, a sorrowing congregation, and a host of friends.

THE GERMAN SAENGERFEST.

THE Germans of New York have got through with their beautiful singing festival. Great preparations had been made, and many distinguished men invited from all parts of the country—from Connecticut, from Buffalo, Baltimore, Alexandria, Philadelphia, and Richmond. The day fixed upon for their arrival here was Saturday, July 15. Owing to some misunderstanding, a large number of the societies were delayed, and did not arrive in this city until after midnight. We illustrate on page 484 the scene upon the arrival of the Jersey Hall Park. The singing societies of New York were on the ground by nine o'clock in the evening to receive the visitors. Upon the arrival of the guests Mayor GUNTHER made a happy and graceful speech, welcoming them to the city. He thought that the cordial harmony between the Germans and Americans, would be conducive to the advancement of the art which is their common bond. Nearly eighty societies were represented, and all had their banners of this city. After the Mayor's speech a torch-light procession was formed from Jersey Hall. The principal rendezvous of the societies was at the Germania Assembly Rooms, which were crowded with a profusion of the national colors at every description. Here the ceremonies of reception took place.

On Sunday evening, the 16th, the singing societies gave a Grand Concert at the Academy of Music, which was filled from amphitheatre to parquette. The orchestra consisted of two hundred and fifty instrumentalists of the city. Over a thousand voices were in the chorus, which covered the entire stage. An interesting feature of the chorus was the presence of one hundred and fifty ladies dressed in white. The principal piece given was MENDELSSOHN'S "Walpurgisnacht." The solos were given by Mastbn ZIMMERMANN and Messrs. BRIGHAM, STOCKS, and THOMAS. The other pieces were rendered by feminine voices. Another concert was given at the Academy on Monday evening.

On Tuesday the Convention was held, and arrangements were made for the next Saengerfest, which will be celebrated at Baltimore in 1867. On the afternoon several excursions were made by the various societies. In the evening a prize concert came off at the Academy. About ten thousand persons competed for the prizes. Messrs. TIDDS, THEODORE THOMAS, and MEISTERDRUCK were the judges. The first prize, which was awarded to the Philadelphia Maennerchor, consisted of a banner of pure white silk, with heavy gold bullion and curb and tassels to match. On one side was represented an ancient bard with a harp, and a female figure with a lyre; on the other was a harp entwined in flowers, with an appropriate inscription. The Philadelphia Saengerbund got the second prize, which was a richly-chased silver goblet. The third prize—a splendid piano—was awarded to the Buffalo Liederkranz.

There was a gigantic picnic on the 19th; and on the next day the festival came to a close. The Germans show an excellent taste in their unions and festivals. They do not get together for political or literary purposes; they care little for speeches, and still less for essays. But give them music, flowers, and plenty of lager and Rhein wein, and they have an infinite fund of amusement and genuine pleasure. As compared with the Englishman or the Frenchman, the German has pre-eminently the faculty of enjoying himself without knowing it.

LAUNCH OF THE "DUNDERBERG."

ON Saturday, July 22, was launched from the yard of W. H. Webb, Esq., foot of Sixth Street, the largest steam-vessel in the world. The launch was accomplished with perfect success, though the weather was so inauspicious. About two thousand tickets were issued.

The principle on which the Dunderberg is constructed is this, namely, that speed and weight of armament are to succeed as invulnerability. The latter, indeed, seems almost unattainable, as no armor is secure against the Armstrong 600-pounder. The plan of the Dunderberg was laid by Mr. WEBB, but the vessel has been built under the general superintendence of Rear-Admiral F. H. GREGORY, of the United States Navy. To render the vessel as invulnerable as possible to the missiles of an enemy her surface, so far as it is exposed, is very angular, as will be seen by the illustration on page 485. A great mass of timber is combined with the protection afforded by a solid armor plating of 4½ inches. The plan of the Dunderberg was suggested by a huge fort embraced for a score of the heaviest cannons. Twenty knots per hour for 21 guns she will probably receive no more than 16. Her tonnage is 5000 tons.

The bulk-heads of this vessel are so perfect that even if the outer walls were destroyed the inner vessel would keep up the mass. The bow of the Dunderberg is fashioned into a huge beak, which constitutes a formidable ram.

Very large and improved magazines and shell-rooms are placed well forward and the fire will be conveniently situated in view of the distance the heavy weights of powder and shell must be hoisted to reach the guns. The weight of shot and shell and powder requisite to prepare the ship for active operations is, of course, very great when the weight of the vessel is taken into consideration.

The iron armor required for the Dunderberg will be about 3500 tons. About one-half, or 600 tons, is already in its position on the ship. The sidearmor is of the best hammered iron, manufactured, in slabs from 4 to 15 feet in length by 2 feet in width. These plates are 3½ inches, and are screwbolted to the armor cushion by 1½-inch bolts. The plates are placed vertically, and not horizontally, as is the case with the iron-clad vessels of Europe.

The screw propeller of the Dunderberg weighs alone 32,000 pounds, and has a pitch of from 27 to 30 feet.

The casemate or fighting-room of the Dunderberg is constructed of square logs, each one foot in thickness, and is built up to the height of seven feet and covered over with a bomb-proof deck, on which it was originally intended to place two turrets similar to those in use on board of the monitors. The casemate will consequently be fourteen hundred feet long and four 15-inch Rodman smooth-bore guns; making it the heaviest armament of its number ever placed on the deck of a vessel. The Dunderberg contract price was one million four hundred thousand dollars—the same as the Dictator, which carries only two 15-inch guns.

The length of the vessel is 380 feet, and her depth of hold over 22 feet. She weighs about 2700 tons in the steel block, bomb-proof deck, and turrets. MAJOR-GENERAL GRIFFIN.

MAJOR-GENERAL CHARLES GRIFFIN, who at the battle of Five Forks superseded General WARREN in command of the Fifth Corps, by order of General SHERIDAN, although one of the youngest, is one of the ablest of our Generals. He entered the Military Academy at West Point, from Ohio, in 1843, and graduated in 1847, with the rank of Brevet Second-Lieutenant of Artillery. In June, 1849, he was promoted to the First Lieutenancy. Previous to his assumption of the command of the corps, General GRIFFIN had for a long time been associated with it as commander of the First Brigade—a division which was always in the front rank, courting danger, whether in a gallant defense against great odds, or in an impetuous charge upon the strong position of the enemy. We give a portrait of General GRIFFIN on page 493.

CLARENCE A. SEWARD.

CLARENCE A. SEWARD, the present Acting Assistant Secretary of State, is the son of the late BENJAMIN FRANKLIN SEWARD, Esq., and a nephew of the Secretary. He was born in Florida, Orange County, in this State, and early in life was adopted into the family of his illustrious uncle, by whom he has been ever treated as a son. After a short training at Geneva College he entered on the study of the law in the office of his uncle at Auburn, where he acquired that knowledge of indomitable perseverance and zealous study which have since achieved for him the eminent position which he now holds at the New York bar. Shortly after being admitted to practice he removed to the city of New York as a partner in the law firm of BLATCHFORD, SEWARD, and GRISWOLD, and by earnest devotion and incessant labor in his profession has gradually attained his present enviable rank in the legal fraternity. At the commencement of the late war he was called to the command of the Nineteenth Regiment, New York Volunteers (having previously filled the post of Judge Advocate General of the State), and after having served for a period was compelled to resign his command by a severe attack of sickness induced by the hardships of a life in the field which his constitution was ill by adapted to endure. Upon his recovery he resumed his practice in this city. In the early part of June Mr. SEWARD was invited to fill the position at present occupied by him, and has since devoted himself with marked ability to the arduous duties of his office. His fidelity to the performance of every duty, an expanded and well cultured intellect, and a nature of more than feminine delicacy and refinement, have won him the admiration and warm regard of all with whom he has been thrown in contact either socially or professionally.

THE TREDEGAR IRON-WORKS.

On page 493 we give an illustration of the Tredegar Iron-Works at Richmond, which during the rebellion were the principal source from which the insurgent armies were supplied with ordnance. During the very earliest stage of the war the rolling-mills of the Southern portion of Delaware and small arms rested mainly upon the hope of a European supply. Nor were they entirely disappointed in this expectation, as will be evident from a careful survey of Southern ordnance which has fallen into our hands. But as the war went on it soon became apparent that blockade-running could not supply the rebel armies with arms. Among the armories which sprung up to supply the deficiency none was so important as the Tredegar Works at Richmond. There were other armories at Atlanta and Augusta, but those at Richmond were more especially celebrated for the excellence and facility of production. Recently we find that the Tredegar Works have been confiscated with the $20,000 exception to the amnesty proclamation.

THE LOST PEARL.

On, the flowers still bloom, and the summer-skies blush With the same golden light, when the ringdove's soft hush And the pale lovely moon, when she rises on high, Is still ruling softly her kingdom of sky;

And the fields are as green, and the sun is as bright, But the heart that once loved them is dead from to-night.

Ah! there's no music now to my desolate ear Like his kind, loving voice sung, that night of a year; To a sorrow like mine there's a mockery keen From la Nature's gay heart, and her festive green; And I roll at whatever is fair to the sight, Since the heart that once loved it is dead from to-night.

I can strive to control, for better to hide Neath the guise of a smile and the armor of pride All the hopes I have lost and the pain I endure, And can strive to conceal from the world's cruel view To the touch of a world ever ready to jeer, What wonder I should to sorrow be ever a mate.

Yes, the world is the same—could I ever suppose One cry could be heard in its ocean of woes? Or the mighty world stop in its onward to go Still the battle goes on, and we seek to decry But the fortunate victor—successful, unhurt, Never pity for those trampled down in the dirt.

For to love and to lose is the commonest woe That's entailed in the list of our sorrows below. I have loved—I have lost—still, still I must live, Though life has in future no promise to give; Gone, gone are the hopes that gave beauty to the light, And the heart that once loved her is dead from to-night.

Would to God there was left me relief in the Past! But the memories I've cherished are worthless at last, Like the miser who finds in his long-hoarded store But counterfeit jewels and false shining ore. Weak, pensive, and sad, I must journey on the night, And the heart that so loved her is dead from to-night.

DAVID BROWN.

I.—1862.

"NOW Brown," said I, as I turned down the bed-quilt, preparatory to getting into bed, "you've been at it again!"

"At what?" quoth Brown.

"Why, shaking the feathers all over to your side of the bed. I won't stand it, now, that's all." And I gave the bed-clothes a twitch with my feet.

Brown fell back on his chair and laughed immoderately.

"Oh, you may laugh," I growled; "but, by George! it's no fun. You're always up to some such boggish trick, and I say it's no fun. I'll give Mrs. Brown notice to-morrow—I don't. I pay as much board as you do, and I won't be come it over this way any more."

"Oh, you do, that's the use in getting grouty, Pomeroy?" said Brown, as he kicked his boots across the room.

"Grouty? Who wouldn't get grouty? I don't come games on you. A fellow's enough to bear at this miserable boarding-house without you to make it worse."

"Now, Pom, let the boarding-house alone. Boarding-houses are all alike. Mrs. Scowle gives as good as any one else will for the money."

"Oh, you can stand any thing. I never see such a fellow's you are. You'd get along in a cooabin."

"I'd get along as good as I could, Pom, wherever I was. I don't believe in being so all-fired thinskinned. Why don't you take things as you find 'em? do."

"Well, you may take my side of the bed, then. See how you'll take that, after you've chook all the feathers over back."

"You don't mean it, Pommy! What a beast you are getting to be!"

"I don't like the place you fixed for me, do you? You'll sleep there, though, or you'll haul me out of bed."

With that I smuggled myself under the quilts as if determined to die there in defense of my rights. Brown laughed a good-natured laugh as he buttoned his night-shirt.

"I guess we won't fight to-night," said he. "It's too late."

Then he turned off the gas and got into bed.

Brown and I boarded at a cheap boarding-house, where the accommodations were graduated very closely down to the price—which I don't mind telling you was four dollars a week. The same style of board costs about twice as much now, you know. We were fellow-clerks in a railroad office, and our salaries were precious small.

I was a regular plunger. Every thing went wrong with me. Did you ever notice that people who are the hardest to please—people who find fault with every thing—generally get the very worst of every thing? That's my experience in boarding-house and hotel life. I used to think Mrs. Scoavle was a regular skinflintess, and every thing in and about her house at wrong ends. I should have left her a dozen times but for that selfish Brown—as I dubbed him, and as I believed him. I was five years older than Brown, but, somehow or other, he used to do pretty much as he pleased with me. There was something curiously fascinating about the fellow, notwithstanding he was such a hog—always looking out for Number One—a very prince of selfishness—must be, or how could he get along so nicely? He was high in favor with Mrs. Scoavle and the servant-girls, while I was quite the reverse. If you ever boarded out you know what that amounts to. The chamber-maid used to do every thing she could to please Brown and vex me; that matter of the feathers was her work, of course, but how could I know it? Brown never enlightened me. That was the worst of it. When I called him a hog he would laugh in my face as though he actually liked it. The table-girls used to look out for him in just the same way. If there was a knife with a handle that wobbled, you may be sure he never got it. I generally did.

The next morning Brown was out of bed bright and early, for it was a holiday with us, and that was a rare thing. He made his toilet cheerily, humming a little song, and was pulling on his best boots, when I got up and proceeded to make my ablutions.

"Now, then, Brown, where's the soap?" said I, in much vexation.

"I don't know," he replied. "I haven't seen any soap. I got along without."

I looked in my pocket immediately.

"Oh, don't stand there staring at me as if I was a funeral, Fom; I haven't swallowed the soap."

"Then where is it?"

"I say I don't know. It may be in your boots for all I can tell."

I looked in my boots, half expecting to find it there, and then washed myself rebelliously.

"Hang me if I don't give Mrs. Scoavle a piece ever for this," said I, as I took up my patent-leather gaiters to rub them off. I found the soap in one of them. "Now, then," I cried triumphantly, "I have it in! I'd like to know how the soap got into my Sunday gaiters. I presume you'll say you didn't put it there."

"I suppose one of us must have done it there," said he.

"Yes, I dare say one of us did," was my angry response.

At dinner that day we had green peas—the first of the season. I am very fond of green peas. So is Brown. We ate them with a relish, and the dish was all too small; but there were no second dishes of such things at Mrs. Scoavle's, and that I knew very well; so I pushed the empty saucer away with a sigh. Brown pushed his away with a wink, directed at me.

A minute later I noticed Brown's dish had been replenished. New regulations, thought I, and beckoned one of the servant-girls.

"Any more peas?" said I.

"Pease is all out, Mr. Fom'oy," said Maggie.

Of course! And there sat that hoggish Brown eating his second dish.

"Brown," said I, as we strolled out after dinner, "I've eaten my last meal in that house."

"Have you?" said Brown, quietly.

"Yes," said I. "You needn't think I shall back down this time. I'm decided, and there's an end of it."

"Now, Pom—"

"You needn't commence it," I interrupted. "I won't bear a word."

"You won't leave a fellow all alone there, will you, Pom?" said Brown, in mock grief?"

"I guess you'll survive," said I. "I'm going to enlist this very day."

Brown and I had been talking about it for some weeks, but I hadn't much thought of really doing it.

"Pom, old boy, if you go I shall go too, that's flat."

"You don't mean you'll enlist with me, do you Brown?"

"Just so."

"You're joking."

"Not unless you are, Pom."

"Why, Brown, you'll be killed! You like your ease too well. What'll Mrs. Scoavle do?"

"Well, it is rather hard on a fellow," said Brown. "I can give Mrs. Scoavle a lock of my hair, you know. I shall stick by you, old man."

We did it. There was a new call for 300,000 men, and a regiment was rapidly filling up. I put my name down among the privates, and right after came the name, in a bold round hand, "David Brown"—that selfish Brown.

I went to bed in an unvented good humor that night; and Brown said, as he flung his pants over the mirror and his necktie under the table,

"Where do you suppose we'll be a year from this, Pom?"

"Away from Mrs. Scoavle's boarding-house," said I.

II.—1863.

"Brown, you're at your old tricks."

"What's the matter now?"

"Why, look at my blanket! It's wet. How's a fellow to sleep on such a blanket as that?"

"Why didn't you dry it?" says Brown. "Mine's as dry as a squirrel's nest."

"Oh, of course it is! How could I dry it when I had to stand guard all the evening? You might have looked after it. You would if you weren't so selfish. That's your style."

"Oh, what's the use growling over a wet blanket? I've slept on one often, and so've you. Take it easy, Pom, and go to sleep."

"You might give me yours after I've been out in the cold the past two hours, and you sitting here by the fire. I believe the blanket would have dried itself if you hadn't shoved it into the furthest corner of the baton. It's like you."

All the answer I got was a snore. Was there ever such a hog?

We were at Chattanooga now. Our quarters were comfortable, for the cold fall rains were kept off entirely by our little red-cotton tents—built the day after we camped. I might say that Brown built it himself, for he certainly did more work than a four-mule team could have done in what way. He never shirked. But when he got his nest made, he sure he was just as ready to enjoy it as he had been to build it. That's healthy work. He could sleep all night in a puddle of water and come out of it next morning as hearty and good-natured as if he had slept in a bed of down.

At breakfast, the morning after the blanket episode, Brown had milk for his coffee.

"Where did you get that?" I asked.

"Tom Bates caught a cow last night," said Brown; "I thought you had some."

"Well, I didn't. Give me a little of yours, can't you?"

I spoke the fellow was in the act of swallowing it.

Spoke too late, Pom," said he, with a broad grin.

"Oh, of course! You're as big a hog as ever. I believe you'd see a fellow starve before you'd give him any thing you wanted for your own precious stomach."

"You won't starve for want of milk in your coffee, Pom. I like it first-rate without milk."

"Well, I don't. I never can get used to it. It goes against my stomach."

"I'll drink it for you, Pom, if you're afraid it'll make you sick."

"Oh, thank you."

I was disgusted with him.

You know how we fought at Chattanooga. That day we went through fire. I can't describe it, of course. We soldiers don't know much how a battle looks; it's a busy time with us.

Night came down on a bloody field, where I lay with my right leg shattered all to pieces by a shell from Lookout. Wounded and dead and dying lay strewn about me.

The darkness settled thicker and thicker. The stars looked down coldly on us. Ah, how I thought about old home! How I tried to decipher Mrs. Scoavle's bed and board! If I were only there now! I've seen the last of that, thought I.

I wondered where Brown was. You see sight of your friends wonderfully in the smoke and din of battles. No doubt he got off safe, and was sitting by the camp-fire now. He always looked out for Number One.

A hand touched mine in the darkness. It was wet with blood.

"Who's this?" uttered a husky, feeble voice.

"Pom Fomroy," said I. "Who are you?"

"No, Pom, you don't say you're here," said the voice. "Are you hurt much?"

"My leg's split to flinders," said I. "Is this Brown?"

"Ay—Brown," said the feeble voice—feeble and muffled—uttered through rebellious groans. "I'm done for, I think."

"Where are you hurt, old man?"

"All over, Pom. There's a whole limb on me. I think there's a bullet through my left lung. I can hardly speak for the blood in my mouth."

We lay in the silence of exhaustion for some minutes, but I knew by the way the poor fellow pressed my hand that he was busy with thought, perhaps with memory.

"Brown," said I, "it's fourteen months to-day since we enlisted. Do you remember?"

"Ah!" he murmured.

"I brought you here, old friend," said I. "Pom, don't say that!"

It seemed to hurt him.

Another long silence followed. We both spoke only with great effort.

"Oh, for a drink of water!" I cried. I was perishing with thirst.

"Have you got at my canteen?" said Brown. "There's some milk in it. Drink it."

I got the canteen, and held it to him.

"Drink you," said I. "It will revive you."

"Don't waste it, Pom. Drink it up. It may keep you alive till they come for you. It wouldn't help me now."

I could not coax him to drink a drop. With eager, trembling lips I touched the mouth of the canteen. Ah, how it revived me!

"They're coming," said I, as I spied a lantern drawing near.

The color of the lantern drew near. There was another with him. They stopped near by, and bending over a still figure which lay there, badly wounded, but, as it appeared, conscious. The one with the lantern thrust his hands into the rebel's pockets, and drew forth the contents. The poor fellow remonstrated. The other summarily dropped a bayonet through his heart.

"Those are my men—Jim, Jim," said the one with the lantern, "when they don't like it. It's humane to put 'em out o' thar pain, sin't it?—ha, ha!"

Then they came to us, and threw the light of their lantern on our faces. We knew our sable. ty lay in perfect submission only. They robbed Brown, and he never stirred or showed a sign of consciousness. I thought myself that all was over with him. Then they came to me.

"The fellow's shamming possum," said one of them, as he spurned my head with his foot.

"Leave him be!" fiercely uttered Brown, in a voice that would have been a shout but for the death-current through which it struggled.

"Fix that feller, Jim!" said the one with the lantern, looking around.

A pistol cracked, and "Jim" leaped up, uttered "God!" and fell dead.

"Damn you!" said the other, turning upon Brown, "you've done it now!" and he flashed a knife over my old friend's head. Brown struck up with his pistol, and the knife flew from the man's hand. At the same instant I caught his foot and tripped him. He fell headlong upon Brown, and was received in the embrace of my dying comrade, who in his death-agony struggled with the cursing brute.

To my last hour I shall remember that fearful scene—the thief and the blood-covered soldier rolling over and over, in the struggle of death, in the dim starlight of that ghastly field; the one cursing furiously, the other silent, with all his energies centred in the grip with which his teeth were fastened upon the throat of the robber.

The laughing, light-hearted fellow, who loved his ease so well, had become expert of my petty vexations, when a great hour of horror came changed to a ban-dog in the service of his friend! Whether he or the dead thief had the best alliance at the moment when he saw my life endangered I know not, and it does not matter. He gave his life to save me, that I know.

I swooned while the struggle yet progressed. Days after I awoke in hospital. They told me how they found poor Brown and the dead-robber lying—the hero's teeth still in the fellow's throat.

You may have heard about this incident of the field of Chattanooga; but you did not know that the fierce soldier was the dearest, noblest, truest friend of my life—David Brown.

LOVE AND PRIDE.

AND so the door has closed on love,
And closed for me on day,
And I must now take heart and go
Upon my lonely way.
For pride stood in the deadly lists,
A dark, relentless foe,
And stirred the depths of bitterness
To hid my true love go.

And love lies slain upon the field—
His death-deep wound I see—
But surely his sweet shade will come
To mock my pride and me;
To mock us in our wild unrest,
And triumph o'er the foe
That stirred the depths of bitterness
To hid my true love go.

To whisper, "Could thy pride be slain
By me in combat true,
The love-light yet might burn again
Within thine eye's fond blue.
But I am but a ghostly shade,
And he my mortal foe,
That stirred the depths of bitterness
To hid thy true love go."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

On the morning of the President's death, the following conversation was overheard between a couple of boys about nine or ten years of age who were walking down State Street, New Haven:

"Charley, news has come that President Lincoln has been killed."

"Do you believe it's true?"

"Yes, it's official."

"What does official mean?"

"Why don't you know? It means that it didn't come from Philadelphia."

Pawnbrokers have never been described as the pioneers of progress, although it must be admitted that they are always ready to make an advance.

The late Mr. Colden used to tell the following anecdote: "When in Kentucky," said he, "I asked an enthusiastic American lady why her country could not test satisfactorily with the metrical system which it already possessed, but must ever be hankering after the lands of its neighbors, when the somewhat remarkable reply was, 'Oh, the prosperity is a very bad one, I admit; but we prize honestly for it, for we inherited it from England.'"

CAPE HAYTIEN.

THE REVOLUTION IN HAYTI.

FOR several months a revolution has been in progress in the Republic of Hayti against the Government of President GEFFRARD. The revolution was never of very formidable dimensions, and is now almost entirely suppressed. The affair originated outside the jurisdiction of the Haytien Government, having been inaugurated by mercenary troops enlisted in the adjoining republic by a Haytien outlaw. There were very few in Hayti who favored the attempt of the insurgents; and if the latter gained some successes at the first it was by a momentary terrorism, and through treachery, and not because any considerable portion of the population were disaffected with President GEFFRARD'S Government. With the exception of SALNAVE all the chiefs of the conspiracy have fled the country SALNAVE with his adherents, at last accounts, was besieged at Cape Haytien, the insurrection having been every where else overthrown. The port of Cape Haytien was declared in a state of blockade on the 14th of May, and the war-steamers Geffrard and Mariani were stationed at the entrance of the harbor. In addition to this the Government had chiefly of Dominicans, entirely cut off from succor, having suffered severely from the carbines of the Government sharp-shooters, were being constantly thinned by desertion, and their supplies were nearly exhausted; while the besieging forces, well supplied with provisions, were receiving continual accessions of men and munitions by land and water. Were it not that the commander of the Government forces, General Carié, carrying out the President's desire, wishes to spare the effusion of blood and the horrors attending the taking of the town by assault, the affair might have been terminated sometime ago. The city was on the point of being captured, when, at the request of the foreign Consuls, there was a suspension of hostilities.

A STREET IN CAPE HAYTIEN.

Cape Haytien, during the rebellion, was the headquarters and coal-station for those vessels of our fleet employed for the convoy of California steamers. The town is situated on the north side of the isle of St. Domingo, and contains about 5000 inhabitants, engaged in the shipping of coffee, hides, and logwood, these being the productions of this part of the island. The leading mercantile houses are mostly foreign, and trade is principally carried on with France and this country. From its position and the excellence of its harbor Cape Haytien is second in importance only to Port-au-Prince, the capital. The houses usually are one story in height, though there are now in process of construction some very fine stores, the upper portions of which are designed as residences of the merchants' families. The ruins on every side of what were once fine buildings indicate the devastation occasioned by the earthquake which occurred some years since. Saturday is the great market-day at the Cape, being the only day devoted to that purpose. On that day provision must be made for the whole of the ensuing week. The market-stalls are all full, and every foot of ground in the market-place is appropriated, those not fortunate enough to possess a stall sitting upon the ground with their wares spread on boards before them. Tropical fruits abound, and the scene is at once ludicrous and exciting. Piles of lemons strew the ground, while the negro women in their bright-colored turbans vend their wares to the crowd of vociferous negroes and whites collected around them. They speak a sort of patois, or French creole, interspersed with many a grunt—this latter being as expressive among Haytiens as a shrug is among Frenchmen. Their currency is mostly paper, which the natives prefer to specie. Here and there may be seen a Haytien soldier, who lives on sixteen cents per week, strutting about or chaffing with some vendor.

The natives of the island are very ignorant and superstitious. It is not long since twelve were shot at Port-au-Prince for cannibalism. The Roman Catholic religion generally prevails.

Revolutions are not unfrequent. That to which we previously alluded, and which occurred last May, began in Cape Haytien. Twenty-seven determined men marched in, and without opposition took possession of the place and established their government. The national troops, under the influence of fear, and carried over by treachery, joined the conspirators. At the same time a similar uprising took place at Gonaives, and here it was that President GEFFRARD made his first attack, defeating the revolutionists. He then marched on Cape Haytien. Here every thing was in an uproar, and many of the citizens fled to the ships lying in the harbor for refuge. Having driven the conspirators to extremities, President GEFFRARD issued a general amnesty proclamation. There was some difficulty in distributing this proclamation at the Cape, but as soon as the offer of pardon was known there was a reaction against the Provisional Government which had been established under JEAN JOSEPH FRANCOIS.

When GEFFRARD'S army moved against the place the Provisional President took refuge on the United States ship Galatea. Many of his confederate officers followed his example.

Says our correspondent: "The scenes in the streets of Cape Haytien during these days beggar description. Bands of women patroled the streets with boxes of broken bottles, stones, etc., on their heads wending their way to the front. Here you could see lines of women, with cannon-balls on their head and one in each hand, bound to the front; several pieces of rusty cannon were dragged through the streets entirely by women, commanded by a colored Colonel; and such yelling could scarcely find its equal any where. Bands of men entered houses seeking powder and fire-arms. All this time a party were kept ashore from the Galatea to protect the foreign vessels. Officers and men are fairly tired out with ceaseless watching. In the mean time the men-of-war were well crowded with women and children, who the troops of GEFFRARD retreated some three miles and awaited the result.

"Affairs continued in this state until the 20th of June. The Government in the mean while massing their troops at the village of Petit Anse. On this day the rebels having titted out a small schooner, mounting a 9-pounder smithing gun with two small row-boats as tenders, proceeded under sail to make an attack on the GEFFRARD troops in the above place. Every glass in the fleet was turned on the advancing vessel. There was but little wind at the time, but still enough to set the vessel through the water at a fair rate. As she neared Petit Anse the soldiers could be seen flocking down to the beach, not knowing the reception that awaited them. Suddenly she put down her helm, and as the vessel came to the wind the crew of her forecastle was hauled on and a shot delivered fairly into the town. Instantly all was commotion. Several field-pieces were brought down and opened fire.

"The vessel after a short contest returned to the Cape without loss. On the night of the 23d two small steamers arrived from Port-au-Prince and commenced a close blockade of the harbor. Shortly after all supplies, GEFFRARD's troops surrounding the town on all sides and the steamers blocking up the mouth of the harbor. And now they wait only for the starvation to bring the rebels to terms. Eventually SALNAVE must surrender."

GOING INTO HOUSEKEEPING.

GOING into housekeeping is one of the events in a man's life to be numbered with the first pair of breeches, with cutting off jackets (the shell of boyhood) to assume the tails of virility; with being married; with the becoming a father. It is an era in one's existence, a grand transformation scene, a great consolation!

But I must pause on the threshold of my castle to relate how I summoned up courage to "take" it. I will confess that I walked round it a good deal. I had difficulty in persuading myself that I was in a position to take a house and be the sole master of it. It was much dearer, too much for my pocket. When I called at the agent's office I was almost afraid lest the head clerk might think me too young and inexperienced. I looked through the window for some time, and fancying that the clerk had a very full, I may say overflowing, sense of the responsible character required for taking a house, I had thoughts of approaching him with the ingenious evasion of the Scottish gentleman who said the sulphur was near for himself, but for a friend' ootside. I was haunted by the dread that I was not sufficiently responsible-looking; that I might look good for rent, but not for rent with rates and taxes combined.

Some say that the eyes are the windows of the soul, and the best signals of the character within; others go by the mouth, the nose, and the chin. Give me the voice. I have often been horribly frightened of great personages until I heard them speak, when all my dread vanished in an instant. The voice told me they were human. Now, when I summoned up courage to address the house-agent's clerk, and he replied with a few words of morning greeting, I knew that he was a man. His eyes indicated nothing; his nose and chin were cast in the mould of service. It was his voice that told me about him. And the tones of his voice said, "I am only a clerk, my master doesn't give me much salary, and I like a glass of ale." Ah, that weakness of human nature for a glass of ale! Amiable, but fatal! Then I observed that that clerk had a voice mellowed by malt I knew how to deal with him. There were "lots of parties after the house," he said. In dry weather, I observed; would it be consistent with his duty to borrow, on his own estates, if he were to step round the corner? He was a wonderfully intelligent man, for he only said, "George, mind the office for a minute or two."

"They keep a good glass of ale round the corner," he said, when we got outside. A glass of ale was the open sesame to that clerk's favor. He told me that there were several parties after the house, and that I must conclude the matter at once if I wanted it, as many in that terrace were in great demand. In the warmth of his friendliness he told out a secret usually strictly guarded by house-agents —the name and address of the landlord. His parting advice to me was to see the landlord without an hour's delay, get the preference, and return and sign the agreement. I took the hint, I took the reference, returned and signed the agreement, and, as I was passing out of the office, two of the "parties" who had been after the house were visiting their wrath and disappointment upon the head of my friend the clerk, who had just informed them that the house was let.

A glass of ale did it! It is not that there is much in a glass of ale, but such small acts of largess are regarded as friendly, and they beget friendliness. In this world there are many little treasure boxes of favor and good-will that fly wide open to you if you only drop the smallest piece of coin into them. There are people in your house this worldly philosophy—penny wise and pound foolish folks, who on all occasions sternly refuse to give any one a single penny over his due. They save their pence and lose hundreds. It is not bribery; it is not the money that does it. It is the favor begotten by a good heart. My only regret is, that the mediumship of friendliness should be so largely monopolized by "something to drink."

But I have been standing all this time on my new door-step. Well, it is pleasant to stand on a door-step that you can call your own. No one else can come here with dirty feet, or with an unfluence, and by kind permission of the lessee. The sticks at the door, which I hope they were dispersed—thinly I will confess—over the various back yards and backtop table hiding its raggedness under a velvet-pile cover, looked quite splendid. I was never tired of wandering from room to room to admire my household gods. Yes, they were mine, and the Temple she was mine—at least while I paid my rent.

And then I had a garden. It was, perhaps, a stretch of courtesy to call it so, for it was not much larger than a good-sized mat, but it had a full-grown lime-tree at the end of it. And fancy being the sole lessee of a full-grown tree! It was such a tall, wide-spreading, umbrageous tree, that if I had sent it to an anatomist of means, he would have pronounced this opinion: "Judging from the tree, the proprietor is a man of substance, of a munificent and an extensive domain." I may tell you, however, that it was well the tree grew upward, for if it had been in its nature to lie down, the garden would not have contained it. So much tree to so little garden I never knew before nor since. I took a vast deal of pride in that tree. I used to accost Primrose Hill to gaze on its top from afar, and say to myself, "Behold, and admire, thou lazy loafer-by as you proof." One may indeed think himself somebody when he has a tree that can be seen two miles off.

On the first night of possession I remained up until long past midnight admiring my rooms. I sat down in them all, one after the other, gazing at their proportions—feeling my property in all my sticks, which looked so domestic in their new sphere. I caught myself saying, "They are mine! they are mine!" like a fox among the grapes in the fable. I was perfectly happy. I could not sleep

Brandreth's Vegetable Pills.

This medicine of enduring efficacy is justly prized as a corrector of all disorders of the stomach and bowels, the common symptoms of which are costiveness, spasms, loss of appetite, sick headache, giddiness, sense of bloating after meals, dimness of the eyes, drowsiness, and cramping pains in the stomach and bowels. These symptoms being suffered to remain, a torpid state of the liver supervenes, and all the horrors of dyspepsia are experienced. Every function of the frame, in a certain extent, requires, and but a little perseverance in the use of Brandreth's Pills will even restore the system from this state of misery. Two or three doses will convince the afflicted of their salutary influence. The stomach will speedily regain its strength, a healthy action of the liver will soon take place, and instead of restlessness, heat, pain, and languor, the appearance, strength, activity, and renewed health will be the blessed result. Principal office Brandreth House, New York.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my PRIVATE GOVERNMENT STAMP is on the box. Sold upon it B. BRANDRETH in white letters.

For sale by all respectable dealers in medicine.

BURNING of the MUSEUM.
LETTER FROM MR. BARNUM.
New York, July 14, 65.
Messrs. Herring & Co.:
GENTLEMEN: Through the destruction of the American Museum has proved a serious loss to myself and the public, I am happy to verify the old adage, that "Ill is all the wind that blows nobody good," and consequently comfortable you that your well-known safes have again demonstrated their superior fire-proof qualities in an extraordinary and severe ordeal.
The safe you made for me some time ago was in the office of the Museum, on the second floor, front of the building, and in the hottest of the fire.
I feel strongly four hours of brisk fire was found among the debris; and on opening it this day has yielded up its contents in very good order—books, papers, policies of insurance, bank bills, all in a condition for immediate use, and in a condition contrary to the testimonials of many Fire-Proof Safes. Truly yours, P. T. BARNUM.

NEW WESTMINSTER, THE CAPITAL OF BRITISH COLUMBIA.—[SKETCHED BY F. L. POPE.]

THE COLLINS OVERLAND TELEGRAPH.

THIS immense enterprise, which is to connect America with Europe by the way of California, Behring Strait, and the Amoor River, is being pushed forward with the utmost energy during the present season, under the auspices of the Western Union Telegraph Company. The wires of the California Telegraph Company have during the past winter been extended through Oregon and Washington Territory, as far as New Westminster, the capital of British Columbia, and are now in operation to that point. At New Westminster the Collins Overland Telegraph proper commences, and will extend up Frazer River nearly to its source, and thence nearly parallel with the coast, following the general direction of the valley between the Rocky Mountains and the Coast Range to a point at or near Behring Strait, which will be crossed by a submarine cable. The line will thence extend through the eastern portion of Siberia until it meets the telegraph, now nearly completed by the Russian Government, from St. Petersburg to the mouth of the Amoor River.

TERMINAL STATION OF COLLINS'S OVERLAND TELEGRAPH, NEW WESTMINSTER, B. C.—[SKETCHED BY F. L. POPE.]

The whole work is under the general supervision of Colonel CHARLES S. BULKLEY, Engineer-in-Chief, who will be remembered as the late efficient superintendent of the United States military lines in the Department of the Gulf. Colonel B. is a man of great experience in practical telegraphing, having constructed the first range of wires between Washington and New Orleans, in the year 1847.

The construction of the overland line through the colony of British Columbia is proceeding with great rapidity, considering the mountainous and difficult nature of the country. This division is under the immediate charge of Assistant-Engineer EDWARD CONWAY, late of the United States Military Telegraph.

A party, under command of Major F. L. POPE, of Massachusetts, is now engaged in making explorations in the country lying between the heads of Frazer River and Behring Strait, in order to determine the most practicable route for the telegraph. Other exploring parties will also be set at work the present season long the Asiatic portion of the route. The city of New Westminster, of which we give an illustration, is pleasantly situated on the north bank of the Fraser, about fifteen miles from its mouth. This spot was selected as the capital of the colony in 1859. At that time a dense forest covered the present site of the city. The forest in this portion of British Columbia grew to an astonishing size. Many of the stumps still remaining in the city measure from 15 to 20 feet in diameter. The trees themselves average over 200 feet in height, and one which was recently cut at New Westminster had attained the enormous height of 309 feet!

New Westminster has already become a place of much importance, and owns many substantial and many stores and dwellings, four churches, a bank, the colonial hospital, and the Government buildings. The residence of the Governor is delightfully situated near the river, a mile above the town.

As a port New Westminster is possessed of great advantages, the Fraser being navigable for vessels drawing 18 or 20 feet of water as far as this place. The overland telegraph crosses the river in front of the city by means of a submarine cable 2500 feet in length.

Our other illustration gives a view of the Office and Headquarters of the Telegraph Company at New Westminster. The work of construction was ormally commenced by setting the first pole—which is seen near the right of the engraving—on the 26th of February, 1865.

GRANDMA.

WILL the "radicals," "fanatics," "secessionalists," and "incendiaries" never give their Grandmother "Conservatism" any peace? Must the poor old lady be kept forever running about trying to hit them with her baggy umbrella and merely losing her balance and her temper together? Will the reprobates never mind her scolding, and go on forever smiling as she calls them hard names in her shrillest tone? Is it not enough that the war is at an end? Must these sturdy fellows clamor to have the results of the war secured? Is it not enough that rebels have been worsted? Must these sentient brawlers insist also that they shall not be trusted? There is a veil in Grandma's nursery, and it has been driven under the bed. Is it not enough to make the nervous old lady forswear her sex to hear these imps crying out to shake an old lady? Isn't she out of sight, you exasperating crew, and won't you shut your mischievous mouths and be quiet?

So the old lady moans and scolds and rocks herself in indicrious wrath. If a pleasant voice says that we had perhaps better consider what is to be done next—"Oh, you abominable radical!" groans the blessed Grandma. If a timid whispers that experience has not taught us to believe every thing which our wayward sisters say—"Oh, you vile sectionalist!" grumpers the bobcap. If a third wonders whether American citizens have equal rights—"Oh, you wretched fanatic!" gasps the buffeted matron. If a fourth mildly suggests that those who have won the victory should organize its results—"Oh, you howling incendiary!" screams the futile virago, shaking her umbrella and ready to fall from her chair in vexation.

Grandmother Conservatism is pretty well known and understood in the family. Her capacity has one rule of action in all possible emergencies—"Shut your mouth and eyes." If you want to be comfortable, she says, don't see any thing and don't say any thing. If the wolf is drinking above the lamb and the wolf accuses his woolly neighbor of muddying the water, shake your fist at the lamb, say that you always call him a vile sectional incendiary for stirring the stream. Suppose he is below the wolf, and can't possibly affect the water where the wolf is drinking—thou fool! is not the wolf the stronger? In any case, will not the wolf make trouble and the lamb submit?

When one of the domestic troubles began our Grandma was an edifying spectacle. Some of the family insisted upon ruling the house exactly as they chose, even to smearing it all over with filth or burning it down. The others protested. The bullies threatened. So we counseled noes, and found that they were those who were bent upon disturbing the household. None of their rights were touched or threatened, but they insisted upon touching those of the rest of the family. It was clear that neither the bullies or the family must surrender. They must rule, or the family must.

Just at the moment Grandmother Conservatism opened her mouth: "Let them have their way," said she to the family, "what have you been squalling them for? Don't you know they are your brethren? Let them have their way, or they'll pull the house down about our ears!"

The family listened to their hearts and their honor, to law and justice, instead of the old woman, and the fight began. The blows—as brothers' blows always are—were deadly. The uproar was tremendous. The din filled the world. And through the whole of it how that old woman did cackle! The young and strong members—those who knew exactly what the quarrel was about, and how all such quarrels must be settled—naturally directed the family in the fight. But whenever they said, "Now, hit 'em here!" they heard the familiar quaver trembling in—"Oh! you wretched fanatics! you vile incendiaries! who brought this horrible struggle upon us!" And whenever the cheery voice of vigor and conviction cried again, "And now, hit 'em there!" once more the shrill scream arose—" Oh, dear me! these radicals will be the death of us! Stop, you sectionalists! I solemnly declare that you are ruining every thing. It is you who are guilty of every thing. Dear me! the floor is shaking; the house is coming down! And you have done it—you factious, incendiary radicals. Oh, those factious radicalism! Oh! oh! oh!" The family put the old lady in the closet, and finished the fight by a general victory.

Now that it is over they have opened the closet and the same Grandmother steps out. She combs her shrills and smooths her disrumpled ribbons and furbelows, she begins at once: "Of course radicalism has no manners. It treats its Grandma without a spark of natural piety. But I give you fair notice, my dears, you suggest any thing I shall use my voice to the utmost. I shall call you names as loud as I can. I shall, you understand, fanatics, radicals, sectionalists, and incendiaries. There!"

The old lady keeps her word. Her tongue rattles like a moving-machine. Her vituperatives with a fluency that is really interesting as a scientific point of view. But her incessant buzz is of exactly the same practical value as during the struggle. These are times for men, not for old women.

MUNICIPAL RIGHTS.

THE city of New York undoubtedly pays more money for a worse government than any city in the world. Its local administration is corrupt and notorious swindle. Its taxes are doubtless three times as large as they need be. Its chief officers are, with few exceptions, the scum of politicians. Neither honesty nor ability, as a rule, are to be found in any department of its civic affairs. Men of character and responsibility instinctively shrink from any direct connection with the persons and processes of the municipal administration as they recoil from pestilence. Every necessary public work is a gigantic public job, for which the tax-payers are enormously fleeced. The "city" is a jest and a by-word at home and a disgrace abroad.

But the city is the source of powers, and they submit to the imposition and cheat. There are periodical protests, but there is no deep, vital, indignant public resolve that the thing cannot shall be abated. When there is it will be. When the tax-payers are determined that their money shall not be stolen they will take the terrible necessary steps to secure it. And the men are willing to be swindled who shall complain? Their submission may disgrace them, as it undoubtedly does. It may show them to be utterly unworthy the institutions under which they live. It may sadly discredit the popular principle. It may encourage by example every public every where, and weaken the majesty of the whole system. It may tend to an ultimate committee of public safety and revolutionary rebellion. But the principles of every city of New York are extremely corrupt, as those of every other city in the world are in various degrees corrupt. There is a reason for suspending entirely its local government when the dangers of local corruption must be even more threatening than they are to justify the total disregard of fundamental principles. And, indeed, the city had followed the advice of FERNANDO WOOD, and had attempted to withdraw from the State, as the Southern States, at the time of WOOD's confederate, ROBERT TOOMBS, and tried to secede from the Union, we should have hoped that the State, having successfully resisted the effort, would also have left the government of the city to be resumed only upon such conditions as it should deem essential to the common safety. But that proposition was denied by every intelligent American, but it would inevitably lead to political alliances between the great city and some of the smaller ones to deprive the other small cities and towns of the same rights. And the power of large cities in such contests is historical.

We hope, therefore, that none of our friends in the country, within the State of New York or beyond it, will suffer from any fear of preposterous issues in our politics. The taste for strong excitement is not extinct with the rebellion, and the purveyors of sensational politics will still hope to startle the nerves of distant readers. Let those readers remember that there are political BARNUMS also, and not hastily agree that every city is sewed to a dried monkey makes a living mermaid.

GENERAL SHERMAN.

GENERAL SHERMAN is making a great many speeches, and they are curiously characteristic. They are trenchant, impetuous, honest, and crude. The crafty managers who thought, when he made his convention with JOHNSTON, that they had now found the man they had been looking for, must watch the daily telegrams with the most painful solicitude. For the General is plainly not a man to be manipulated. He thinks clearly his own views without the least regard to any conceivable party exigency. He has all the traditional honesty and directness of a soldier. In New York he disdained the embraces of the Common Council, to which political aspirants are usually obliged to submit. In Ohio he said that General COX was a good soldier, and he hoped he would be elected Governor. Yet there were persons who thought that the hero of Atlanta would actually receive a nomination from the party that supported VALLANDIGHAM two years ago! In Indianapolis—without the least regret for "the compromises," or the divine rights of States to make beasts of men, so long a cherished "principle" of "the party"—he said that his sea-faring ancestors helped to import slaves, and he felt it to be his duty to atone for the ancestral sins. Alas for the managers! A man with profound moral convictions is not a safe candidate for "the party."

General SHERMAN, indeed, opposes negro suffrage and indiscriminate intercourse with whites. He says that his experience in Mexico and South America led to this conclusion. Did his experience in those countries also persuade him that white suffrage was any more to be trusted? He believes, also, that the whites must have the governing power. But the American doctrine of Liberty means the right of opportunity for all men. It has nothing to do with the color of faces or the equality of races. A professional politician appealing to the grog-shops and partypress may harangue about "white men," and be welcome. But the conceit that men are not to have equal rights because of their color is a foolish figment which will not long be entertained in so masculine a brain and honest a heart as General SHERMAN's. His good sense rallied again in saying that military law was the natural law of self-preservation, and that the moment it was passed he hoped the civil law would resume its sway.

There is a boyish impulsiveness and frankness in all that General SHERMAN says and does which are very winning. His instincts are generous, but his opinions are often immature and hasty. Amazed as we were by the convention which he made with JOHNSTON, we can not praise too highly the manly tone of his letter of the 25th of July to the Secretary of War, in which he said, with noble simplicity, "I admit my folly in embracing in a military convention any civil matter;" and, alluding to the political pride, "I had flattered myself that by four years of patient and unremitting and successful labor I deserved no reminder such as is contained in the last paragraph of your letter to General GRANT."

General SHERMAN's speeches have doubtless imperiled his availability—which he probably despises—with the politicians, but they have not harmed him in the estimation of honest men.

THE CONDITION OF THE PATIENT.

THE New York Evening Post, which is inclined to an optimistic view of the situation in the unorganized States, and which thinks that we must expect to see for a long time at the South the evidences of the late terrible convulsion, says, "Will not the old convictions stand?" it asks, "the old feelings awake, the old scores be settled and shot. Even if there had been no civil war to sharpen the acuteness of our jealousies and raise new grounds of contention, it would be hard and difficult to allay these animosities or to correct these reciprocal suspicions and repulsions. But now that the fierce and violent passions of an actual conflict of arms have been superadded to the old causes of estrangement and dislike, it will be still more difficult."

Certainly it will. The feeling of the whole region is morbid. A letter in the Cincinnati Gazette says: "If the returned rebel officers and soldiers, of whom it has been popular to say 'all the rebellion is whipped out of them,' are so anxious to reconstruct the old Union, why is it that they will not do so?" Is there sufficient reason to establish the fact?" It then quotes several instances of "wicked insubordination," which it says it would not mention if they were isolated and not representative cases. A correspondent of the New York Herald, who has traveled for the purpose of observation four thousand miles through the South of the late rebellion in Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, reports that the general feeling is one of sequiescence in the force of superior numbers. "We don't admit that our cause was a bad one, but it has failed." The Raleigh Progress says that "the native element, including the aristocracy, are growing more defiant every-day, and now openly threaten to hang Union men and negroes as soon as the troops are withdrawn;" and it declares that every consideration of justice and safety requires their continued presence. The Mobile News has a letter from Okolona, in Mississipi, written a month ago, which says that "many of the best citizens hesitate to take the amnesty oath. They say that they thus bind themselves to perfect the ruin of their country." And an intelligent correspondent of the Philadelphia Press writes from Mobile: "I have listened by the hour to the familiar, social, unrestrained talk of Southern people, and I have been sorry to conclude, from all that I have heard, that the damnable heresy of the States Right doctrine, again, with imagined evils threatened to the institution of slavery, they based their acts of secession and rebellion, is as deeply rooted in their convictions as it ever was."

All our private information is in the same strain. The entire testimony is of universal disaffection. That it is the morbid exhibition of chagrin is true, but it is also the sign of actual hostility. That we must not exaggerate it nor be too much concerned at a logical consequence of defeat, is a judicious suggestion, but that it is an occasional or exceptional state of mind and form of expression is an unreasonable assertion. If the condition of sentiment which is indicated in what we have quoted be exceptional, we should be glad to be referred to illustrations of the rule.

And what is the simple moral of the tale? Plainly that, while the system is morbid, it should not be treated as sound. While the old sores still ache and shoot, they should not be considered as healed. The patient has undergone the operation and has survived it, but he is not well yet. He is not strong. He is diseased still, and weak, and his frame is full of ill-humors. It would be wicked folly to treat him as a healthy hearty man who can go unassisted, about his usual business. He is under the physician's hands. He must still submit to the necessary regimen. He must do whatever the physician shall prescribe as essential to cure. It may be disagreeable, but curative processes often are. That the patient is still a man, is undeniable. But that he is a well man, and has either the right or power to do what well men may, is absurd. See what antics he played the other day at the Fredericksburg and Henrico County elections in Virginia! His conduct showed him to be out of his head. Let us, then, provide every means of safe and speedy cure. Let us encourage the kind nurses about to their normal action. But let us take the most vigilant care, meanwhile, that he neither harms himself nor his neighbors.

THE REVENUE COMMISSION.

THE suggestion of a commission to codify our elaborate and confused revenue system, and to report upon the best practical method of raising internal and external revenue, was very wise; and the principle of appointing non-political Commissioners was very sensible. Instead of selecting gentlemen of a general public prominence, which is too much the principle upon which all official appointments are made, the Secretary of the Treasury has named three Commissioners—Mr. DAVID A. WELLS, of Troy; Mr. STEPHEN COLWELL, of Philadelphia; and Mr. S. S. HAYES, of Chicago.

None of these gentlemen are generally known to the public as orators or as writers. Any amount of scientific information is a standard work. But they are all men peculiarly accomplished by study and experience for the special work to which they are called. Such as the questions which they must explore are both of theory and experience, the selection appears to us to be very judicious. Mr. DAVID A. WELLS, called "Our Burden and our Strength," was one of those words which are deeds. It was one of the most effective and most decisive corrosive reasons for the confidence of the country in its ability to pay any debt necessary to a victorious end of the war, and not only fortified our best friends, but silenced our most assiduous foes in Europe. Mr. COLWELL's peculiar ability on all subjects of economical science, derived from the most thorough study and the most extensive and successful experience as a merchant and iron manufacturer, has been long known by the Government, and his advice has been constantly sought. Mr. HAYES is an intelligent merchant of Chicago, whose knowledge and experience of Western trade, resources, and facilities will be of the utmost value.

It is a wise practice, which we trust may be generally adopted, to select for important public trusts and inquiries of this kind simple, upon careful inquiry, are found especially fitted for them, in preference to those who are especially clamorous or anxious to fill them. There is always a vast multitude of pagons, whose names are more or less publicly familiar, who are ready for any thing, from the superintendence of a national laboratory to the command of coast boats or the embassy to Japan; and, without reason, the mere publicity of a name is accepted as a kind of credential of qualification. But in the case of such a commission as this, for the examination of the revenue system, the presumption should be in favor of names not generally known, upon the ground that the appointing power had sought by carefully-directed inquiries to discover the most trusty and capable persons.

With the gentlemen named upon this commission we may be sure that there will be neither bribery, nor ignorance, nor political prejudice to perplex the investigation; but that an arduous, most useful, and thankless task will be thoroughly and satisfactorily accomplished.

DEAD-HEADS.

In a previous article in this journal attention was drawn to the increased traffic of Northern railways since the restoration of peace, and at the same time reference was made to two prominent causes of the unpopularity of railway stocks as investments. Since then the action taken by two prominent boards of railway direction is suggestive of further development of the subject. The directors of the Michigan Southern and Northern Indiana Railroad have "passed" (i. e., failed to pay) their summer dividend on their common stock; while the directors of the Erie Railway Company, on 26th ult., declared a dividend of four per cent. on their common stock.

The cases of these two companies were identical in every point save the last action of the directors. Both had fully earned a dividend. Neither had any money on hand. Both had spent their surplus earnings on new equipment and increased facilities for the transaction of business. The Michigan Southern reported for last year about $1,500,000, only $900,000 of which reached the hands of the treasurer, the balance having been used by the superintendent to pay for new rolling stock. Thus when dividend day came round, last January, the directors had no money on hand; but, unwilling to disappoint their stockholders, they declared a 10 per cent., and borrowed the money to pay it. During the first six months of 1865 the Company earned about $2 per cent. more than in the corresponding period of 1864; yet the directors have not yet been able to pay back the loan of last January. The Erie started in 1864 about $4,000,000 net; yet, when the directors met in January to determine the dividend question, it was found that not only had the Company no money to pay it, though $1,000 shops and 1,000 stock had been sold at above par for new construction, but it owed $1,060,000 to a leading director, and had other liabilities maturing in the ensuing six months which it was clear the income of the road could not meet. The Erie directors, like the directors of the Michigan Southern, were unwilling to disappoint their stockholders, and declared the usual four per cent. dividend, borrowing the money to pay it. This loan has not been paid off. Thus the true position of the two concerns was alike at every stage. Now it begins to differ. The Erie directors, relying on enormous gross earnings, and on the evident increasing popularity of the road, pay another dividend, borrowing the money again for the purpose; the Michigan Southern directors suspend dividends until they can pay off their floating debt.

Without undertaking to canvass the arguments which can be urged in support of either policy, it may be remarked that the embarrassments of both companies have arisen from the fatal error to which we lately drew attention—an attempt to provide out of earnings new construction and keep pace with the rapid development of the country and the increase of local traffic. In this effort—which always has proved in railways will prove suicidal—either the Company or the stockholders must be sacrificed. The Erie directors have sacrificed the Company; the Michigan Southern directors their stockholders.

A traveler passing over each of the two Northern lines of railway is apt to form an exaggerated notion of the prosperity of those companies. He sees train after train crowded to suffocation and limited in length only by the capacity of the locomotive to haul it; long strings of freight cars at every turn-out waiting for an idle engine to draw them forward; merchandise and produce piled on the side of the line for months, merely praying to be moved. He naturally infers that such railroads must be rolling in wealth. And yet, if he inquires, he will find that these same roads can barely pay interest on their debt.

The anomaly is easily explained on lines whose managers insist on defraying new construction out of earnings. But every road upon which avoid this blunder there are vices of administration which suffice to account for unproductiveness. The chief of these is the Dead-head system.

It may seem a remarkable statement, but we believe it is true that on our Western lines there are more free trains paying passengers, in the language of a leading director of a prominent Western road:

"We [meaning the directors] have to pass all the members of the Legislature, editors and politicians, for fear of hostile legislation. Then our freight agents pass all the merchants, in order to get their freight. Finally, the conductors pass all the tavern and hotel keepers, livery-stable keepers, theatrical and fancy people, for obvious reasons. Nobody that I can discover pays his fare on our line except green emigrants, foreign travelers, and a few farmers."

There is no reason to regard the statement as exaggerated. Another railway director states that in Chicago no man who "knows the ropes" and possesses any degree of smartness ever, by any chance, pays any railroad fare to the East. Even when freight offers far in excess of the lines to carry it, the competition between the various agents and touters is so brisk that, for the sake of securing the promise of a merchant's business, free passes for himself, his family, and even his friends are offered—nay, pressed upon him. No business in the world could stand such a tax as this.

Why a man who would scorn not only to beg $5 of his neighbor, but to receive such a sum as a present, should not only be willing to accept a free railroad ticket worth $5, but should sue for it as a favor or demand it as a right, when the least reflection would satisfy him that every dollar used to him is just a dollar taken out of the pocket of some railway shareholder who needs it badly, is one of the anomalies of modern civilization. Here in the East the system does still flourish in some degree, but in the West. But even here, when a gentleman of pretty extensive acquaintance in Wall Street mentioned to a friend that he had some new business to a town on the New York Central, he was told:

"You go by the boat? All right. Ask Mr. Drew; he'll give you a pass. On the Central I'll get you a pass from Mr. ——, one of the freight agents; he's a great friend of mine; we've just had a cocktail together. Then on the Hudson River? Call on old VANDERBILT; he'll give you a season ticket."

Remark that the gentleman who thus seemed to assume that payment was out of the question would have knocked down any man who had proposed to give him, as a free donation, three dollars currency, and that he would, for refusing this begging enterprise was to be-set on foot, was perfectly able to pay his way, had no sort of claim on railway officials, never could in any chance help or hurt them. The theory simply was that it is mean to beg money, but not mean to beg its equivalent in railway tickets.

Time was, they say, when editors were notorious dead-heads—not only traveled free, but lived free at hotels, and were got into shows, boots, and breeches free of charge. There was a degree of fairness in this. The editor was expected to give a puff in exchange for the stateroom, dinner, hat, or breeches: and calculating the puff at so much a line according to the current rates of advertising, the dead-head did not always get the best of the bargain. Now, when no respectable newspaper admits puffs on such terms; and it is well understood that editors have "their price" for their influence, there is merely indigent beggars who plead in forma pauperis, and have nothing to give in exchange for the alms they receive.

So far as the railroads are concerned the dead-head system is simply ruin to them. It requires good and careful management on the part of all managers to keep down the tide in the face of constantly-increasing charges for repairs, and the fluctuations of crops, and the uncertainties of unseasonable severity of gales, unless it make money unless it be administered with severe economy and close vigilance. Leaks, either in the income or in the outgo, will eventually ruin the best situate road. In our great railroad-building era—from 1848 to 1858—wherever we found business for one line we built two or three, and though the whole trade of the country and the increase of population are helping all the leading lines toward a position of productiveness, the least waste or mismanagement tells rapidly on the dividends.

If the stock of our leading lines—especially in the West—is ever to become as reliable an investment as bank or insurance stocks the dead-head system must be abolished, and people must no more expect to be carried free on railway trains than they expect to get their fire-insurance free of charge, or to have bank facilities extended to them when they have no claim to such accommodation.

PUBLIC PROGRESS.

A new public danger menaces us. An audacious party is organizing for crimes that twenty-five cents he will inclose to any address "the likeness of your future husband," and a prosperous town in Washington has decided that a woman may shoot a man who jilts her. Now if the ingenious youth chooses to send to any curious dame in Buffalo or Milwaukee, or at some remote point on the Pacific coast, the likeness of Joe or Chattahoochie rivers, the likeness of the amiable gentleman who is at this moment pressing these images to his thoughtless bosom as he serve as "the future husband," is it not plain that he has—unwittingly, indeed, but none the less surely—received false hope, for which he must be prepared to suffer? Clearly, if a man, upon intimate acquaintance with a lady, can not change his matrimonial mind without justifying her shooting him, how can he be sure, in the case of he changes his mind without any acquaintance whatever? Why may there not be constructive jilting as well as constructive treason?

There is another interesting aspect of the question. Suppose the jilting to be first upon the woman's side, and the swain in despair betakes himself to another bride. Why, to gratify her wounded pride that a man whom she has rejected should console himself with the smiles of another, should not the indignant lady shoot the old lover at sight, claim that she was jilted, put in his love-letters as evidence, and be triumphantly acquitted amidst enthusiastic applause?

The natural interpretation of the new code of courtship is found in the story that is told in the papers. "CARRIE, dear, will you please send me your revolver, I fear GEORGE will not be true to his promise to-night?" "Why, EMMA, I'm so sorry. I've just lent my revolver to MARY, as she has found a beau with over a million more money than ALFRED; but, dear, I can let you have my ivory-handled stiletto with much pleasure."

The use of the tenderly-made human life less sacred in public estimation, or a jury would hardly have held jilting to be a justification of murder. That a woman should shoot a man who has betrayed and jilted her is accepted by society, for obvious reasons, as a wild justice. But a breach of promise to marry has not hitherto been supposed to excuse assassination; and, wise people, however, will not disdain to learn. Mr. KEVERDY JOHNSON makes perjury a political duty; Mr. HORACE GREELEY would have active treason viewed as a difference of opinion; and a Washington jury finds that a man who breaks his word is justly shot for it.

Meanwhile the question raises a question. A gentleman, discovering the criminal complicity of another with his wife, shoots him dead upon the street. Here is revenge for an actual injury. But if a woman who murders a man for breaking his word is acquitted amidst the tumultuous applause of the audience, ought not a man to murder another for a terrible wrong to be invited to a public dinner?

A subscription has been proposed for Miss HARRIET LANE, Johnston's niece, to be suggested for the wife and child of her victim?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

OUR ARMY ON THE RIO GRANDE.

While every where else our armies are diminishing the number of their troops, they are increasing every week. General Sheridan's cavalry force are on the move from Shreveport to Texas. Reinforcements have been issued to prevent the soldiers from straggling and deserting. General Sheridan's plan in invading Texas "that the cavalry commands on the march in the same sense in which they are used in battle, with the best interests of the people. The troops will be kept in the most exact state of discipline, and the sacredness of the rights of individuals, should any occur, will be severely punished." The soldiers will be says: "The position of the command is called to the fact that the march will be made through a country in open rebellion against the government and laws of the United States. The rights of property and persons must be respected. All will be forbidden to enter the houses of citizens under any pretense whatever, and to commit any depredations. Conduct of the command in all matters of discipline will be such as to give no just cause of complaint."

The head-quarters of Generals Steele and Weitzel were established on the Rio Grande, but will probably be soon removed to Brownsville. Clarksville and White Ranch, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, have been occupied with strong forces. Troops are rapidly arriving. All are marching to the Rio Grande along the Rio Grande. The Fourth Corps was partly in New Orleans and partly at Mobile on the 1st instant. The reputation of Weitzel's artillery was leaving New Orleans, only delayed by the difficulty of procuring transportation for leaving on the Texas coast.

The 25th corps, mostly French, lies off the Rio Grande. Maximilian's forces are estimated at from 16,000 to 20,000. Cortinas is said to be on the Texas side of the river, a few miles above Matamoras.

RECONSTRUCTION.

We make some extracts from Governor in regard to the Richmond election. The result of the election is unfavorable not only as to the number elected but as to the spirit with which it was conducted. A direct issue was made between the loyal men and those who were opposed to secession, and the latter triumphed. It was on that account that Governor PIERPOINT Turner annulled the election by an order issued July 29. The grounds for this order are stated in the following terms:

1. The exclusion of voters on the ground of having lost their residence during the late civil war, was a test which such ground was taken as against citizens absent in rebel lands.

2. With few exceptions all of the officers elected have been prominent rebels.

3. The issue was direct as between rebels and Unionists.

The Richmond Republic had before the election warned the people of the "Reign of Terror," urged them to go forward no candidates that had been either Confederate or State officers, because they would be unable to get themselves open to charges of dissatisfaction, if not of disloyalty. The main object of the people ought to be to prove that they were loyal to the Union, now that they have thrown down their arms, and that they make no unusual reservation in taking the oath of allegiance. It was not.

If it is thought Union citizens could be induced to be elected to the military holders, civil government will be restored, and general prosperity will return. Governor PIERPOINT is not of this opinion. On the contrary, gentlemen elected to whom the military authorities have no objection, will be prevented from taking their offices, and the military power will be continued, and a repeated series of "reign of terror" will ensue.

The President, too, has other hand, treated the whole subject with characteristic levity. The people of Richmond acted above their heads in the matter of voting for this man or that man; and, to show that they were not, up comes the President, and tells them to go below or Chattahoochie rivers, the likeness of the amiable gentleman who is at this moment pressing these images to his thoughtless bosom as he serve as "the future husband," is it not plain that he has—unwittingly, indeed, but none the less surely—received false hope, for which he must be prepared to suffer? The Richmond Whig more frankly discloses its rebel proclivities. It discourses upon the election in the following strain:

"Here, at the termination of a war unparalleled in its duration and magnitude, the people have the substance of the State to the General Government can scarcely be found unscathed. Nearly all, in large proportion to the untrammeled power, give expression to their views and feelings in a manner which leaves no doubt or room for doubt. The election of yesterday simply means that the people of Virginia are, as they have been, prepared to be taken as a representative of that people, turn not with the spirit of the times, and the feelings of the masses which their flesh and kin have died for. While no open assertion of political views was made before the election, it is clear that the protestations of a pseudo-Unionism on the one hand, met by a political reticence on the other, gave the voters the true issue upon which they were called upon to decide; and all whose pride and love of State cling to the Old Dominion will rejoice to-day that the decision has been made in favor of good men and true."

THE NAVAL TRIAL.

Immediately upon the reception of the letter of Mr. Dickerson challenging the court of the captain of the Ironsides, built under his supervision and direction, with any vessel of a similar class that might be designated, to decide the claim of superiority of his engines in economy of fuel and development of power, Secretary WELLES issued orders designating the Wyandank as the competing vessel. The trial so proposed by the Secretary will be simply a test of the machinery of the Algonquin, as compared with that of the double-enders now used in the navy. The two things to be considered are the amount of power developed and the cost of fuel. The trial will take place at the New York wharf.

NEWS ITEMS.

The rebel pirate Shenandoah has been definitely heard from by the whaling bark Milo, which brings to San Francisco several crews of vessels destroyed last month. It seems that the pirate ceased to molest vessels after the surrender, but affected not to believe it. He was also informed of the assassination of President Lincoln, and that he believed readily because he expected it. The Arctic whaling fleet of about 40 vessels will probably be nearly destroyed. The pirate is said to have sailed last from Ochotsk, and to be manned by English and Australian convicts.

General Schofield, commanding the Department of North Carolina, with head-quarters at Raleigh, has issued an order requiring every farmer in the late rebel states to remove all badges, military buttons, braid, cord, or other articles designating rank. All persons having such articles on, five days after receiving notice of the order, are to have the same taken off them by the Provost Marshal.

Major E. S. Dixon, on duty in the Bureau of Military Justice, has just returned from a tour through the South, where he has been collecting evidence against some of the rebels of the late rebel Government, who are charged with cruelty to our prisoners while confined at Andersonville and other places in the South. The commandant of the Andersonville prison, Captain WIRZ, has been arrested and lodged in the Old Capitol. He is shortly to be put upon the trial for the crimes and barbarities of murder by him upon our prisoners confined at that place. The military commission, of which Major-General Hancock, Brigadier-General A. B. Hinthewood is President, and Colonel N. P. Chipman, of the Judge Advocate Department, is Judge-Advocate, has been directed to try the case. The Government is now engaged in the collection of evidence preparatory to trial.

A rich correspondent of the Chicago Tribune having claimed that four-fifths of the Union army during the late war were Democrats, that paper invited the latter to the question of the army-vote will show that not exceeding 50,000 out of 800,000 voted for Mr. WILD. Ten per cent. of the whole 1,500,000 names on the rolls eighty per cent. of those who were in the army gave their votes for Mr. LINCOLN. Chicago Democrats generally sympathized with slavery and the rebellion. Mr. WILD was defeated, and Mr. LINCOLN elected to maintain the Union.

The City of Hudson was visited July 26 by a gang of thieves and robbers, who accompanied the obsequies of the Emmet Guard from Albany. The most violent outrages were committed in the streets, and the stores and houses were held entire possession of the city, assaulting men, women, and children, and committing outrages unmentionable. Only six arrests were made, and 6 strangely learned Judge let the victims off with a fine of $5 each. The Judge has a premium on rowdyism.

The secretary of War, appreciating the importance of collecting and preserving the records of the war, has issued the following order to the officers of the army: "The Patriot Locher has been appointed chief, with a pay of Cavalry Colonel, for the collection, safe-keeping, and publication of rebel archive that have come into the possession of this War Department."

The Florida Times says that the enlisted father of Payne, the would-be murderer of Secretary Seward, has been working on the railroad at Lake City, Florida. The Union says: "The father of Payne called on us one day last week. He called on us in a miserable plight, from Live Oak Station, on the Pensacola and Georgia Railroad, and lost one arm in the service. Subsequently he returned home maimed for life. 'Lewis' was his only hope in the field, and as he enlisted father was a Baptist minister, as has been stated."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE news of the fate of the conspirators concerned in the assassination of President Lincoln occasioned no surprise in Europe. The London Times says:

"They have been convicted in fact by a court-martial, after a trial as open and complete as the patience of the American public. Whatever may be alleged against the constitution of the military tribunal, the proceedings were certainly not too summary, for they lasted over many days, and were found to be embodied in a huge printed manuscript. No less than 351 witnesses were examined, and it is to be presumed that the evidence of the greater part of these called for the defense has been conveyed out of the country. Of course the cowardly attack on unarmed and defenseless men. The Lincoln and his fellow-conspirators were most justly forfeited. If those who can recognize no crime in rebellion against a tyrannical government are entitled as an appeal to a higher law, it can be justified before a higher tribunal than any earthly judgment-seat."

The court and jury, it seems, were not so gallant as in the case of Miss Harris, the circumstances of whose crime were far less extenuating. The victim of Constance Kent's murder was a little child, and the murderer had been a young girl of fifteen or sixteen when the crime was committed. She was detected through her own confession.

TRIAL OF MOWING-MACHINES.

A TRIAL of mowing-machines as to their efficiency and draft came off on the 25th and 26th of July, on the banks of the little river Bronx, at West Mount Vernon, on the Harlem road. The competition was for the prize of a gold medal offered by the American Institute for the best mowing-machine. Owing to the limited advertisement of the trial, and the short time allowed for preparation, but a few machines were present. About two thousand persons were present to witness the affair, but were kept waiting in the hot sun for hours after the appointed time.

As proving the merits of any one machine over the rest the trial can not be considered at all conclusive. It seems to us that at least a week's time should be given to such a trial, and that, under all the circumstances of various growths of clover and grass, the month of June decidedly offering the most advantages. The horses should be ordinary farm-horses, no great superiority of one team over another being allowed; the wear and tear of machines, the condition of the horses, and the amount of work done all taken into consideration. The best farmers do not believe any thorough test of machines can be made in a day with picked men and horses, and machines much more highly wrought than the average of those kept for sale.

The trial, on the whole, resulted favorably for the mechanical interests concerned. It conclusively proved the superiority of machine over hand labor.

THE RICHMOND ELECTION, JULY 25, 1865—THE POLLING AT THE FIRST MARKET-HOUSE, CORNER OF MAINE AND 17TH STREETS.—[SKETCHED BY J. R. HAMILTON.]

THE RICHMOND ELECTION.

THE various elections now going on in the States recently in rebellion are a cause of deep interest and solicitude throughout the country, for upon the spirit evinced in these elections will very much depend the mode of treatment to be henceforth accorded the Southern States by the Government. We know of no State which is watched with more anxiety than Virginia; for, now as heretofore, her actions form a guide and model for the remaining portion of the South.

The election which took place in Richmond on Tuesday the 25th July was of unusual consequence, and involved the selection of a Mayor and all other municipal officers. The military authorities, with commendable reticence, refrained from taking any steps whatever that could be, directly or indirectly, construed into an attempt at influencing the result. They were determined that it should be a spontaneous exhibition of the feeling existing among the people. That feeling does not appear to have been all that could be desired by the military authorities and the "Unconditional Union" portion of the community, as the results showed that a marked preference was given to those who could claim active participation in the insurgent army, and that Mr. TAYLOR, the avowed Union candidate, lost his election by a published card distinctly declaring his sentiments. For these and other inimical symptoms General TERRETT annulled the election.

We give on page 501 two sketches by Mr. J. R. HAMILTON, one representing the City Hall, the place of polling in Madison Ward, and the other the Market-house, Jefferson Ward. The City Hall is a plain building, the facade of which is almost hidden from the street view by luxuriant foliage. It was erected in 1821, after the fire burning of the Richmond Theatre, and afterward remodeled in 1854. Here is held the Mayor's Court, the Court of Hustings, the Superior Common Law Court, and other municipal offices. The new Market-house was erected about 1854, on the site of the old fire Market-house, which had been standing there ever since the early duration of the city. The upper part was used during the war as a rendezvous for Confederate troops, and is now employed as a barrack for our soldiers. There is a third polling-place in the upper part of the city (the Monroe Ward), which is in the old blacksmith shop of THOMAS C. EYRE, and is a very old and dilapidated structure.

GIRDLING THE WORLD BY TELEGRAPH.

IT is now quite certain, in the event of the success of the Atlantic Telegraph, that within the next five years there will be a continuous system of telegraphic communication around the globe. We give this week on our first page, and on pages 500, 501, 505, and 508, a large number of illustrations relating to each of the three important sections or departments of this world-surrounding system. The telegraph map of the world on page 508 will give our readers at a glance the whole of this grand system of intercommunication. The three separate divisions may be thus designated:

I. The Atlantic Telegraph, from Valentia to Heart's Content, connecting Europe with America.

II. The Overland Telegraph, connecting America with Asia.

III. The Indo-European Telegraph, connecting Asia with Europe.

The most important of these three sections, and at the same time the most uncertain, is the Atlantic Telegraph. The cable, which was completed on the 29th of May, has a continuous and uninterrupted circuit of 2300 miles. Every possible precaution has been regarded in its construction, and in paying it out. As the former cable, though not nearly so carefully wrought, was momentarily a success, it seemed to demonstrate the possibility of a telegraphic communication across the Atlantic. The present cable will bear a strain upon it of two tons and three-fourths tons. If successful—and its patrons surely deserve success for their perseverance—it will be the greatest triumph ever achieved by mechanical art over nature. Its success will be something more brilliant than the achievement of the most exciting romance, more poetic than Shakespeare's happiest thought.

The Overland Telegraph, of which we give a separate description elsewhere, is peculiarly important to this country and to Russia; and, in case of any failure or interruption in the great Atlantic cable, will afford communication between Europe and this country across Asia.

Great Britain has granted a charter for the construction of the line through her American possessions, and last July Congress, in chartering the company, directed the Secretary of the Navy to detail, for the use of the surveys and soundings along that portion of the Pacific coast, both of America and Asia, where it is proposed to establish the telegraph, one steam or sailing vessel, in his discretion, to assist in surveys and soundings, laying down submerged cable, and in transporting materials connected therewith. Secretary WELLES's "discretion" has already assigned the steamer Active to the ter, transferred from the Treasury to the Navy Department, which has been refitted and arbed at San Francisco in the service of the company. The other and larger steamer was also sent out from this side. With the vessels already employed, and those that will be engaged in the construction and transport of materials and supplies, the land and naval force of the expedition will number not less than two thousand men.

New Westminster, the Gulf of Georgia, British Columbia, is the immediate base of operations. The first stretch will be from New Westminster to Fort Alexander, thence to Fort Fraser or Fort St. James, and thence to Fort Bulkley, a distance, as the crow flies, of about four hundred miles. The country thus far has been explored and is settled "in spots" by fur-hunters and trappers. But beyond, on a nearly direct line to the Petty River, are forts and stations, here and there, belonging to or built for the Hudson's Bay Company. It is the necessity for supplies and materials will keep the exploring party, and still establish the telegraph line, nearer the coast, and the route proposed now completes an exploration of 3000 miles through wild and heretofore almost untrodden territory from Lake Babine, the centre of British Columbia, to the Yukon River, the extreme limit of the British possessions in America.

From Yukon River to Cape Prince of Wales, the nearest point to the Asiatic coast, the route is easy: and from that cape to Cape East, the distance across Behring Strait requiring a submerged cable, is only thirty-six miles.

On the Asiatic continent the point to be reached is the mouth of the Amoor River. The route may extend by land the entire distance, or only to Penjinsk Gulf, and by cable across the Okhotsk sea. To reach the mouth of the Amoor River will require a period of at least three years, and by that time the Russians will have completed the connecting line from this point to Irkoutsk, which is already connected by telegraph with St. Petersburg. Then, with or without the Atlantic telegraph line, the Puck prophecy of putting a girdle round the earth will be fully realized.

With the mouth of the Amoor River there are in reality two systems of telegraphic communication with Europe—the Indo-European and the line passing through Siberia to St. Petersburg. The Indo-European telegraph extends from England through Turkey and the Persian Gulf, partly by land and partly by sea. The route through the Persian Gulf was established by the latter to establish communication by way of the Red Sea. The line was laid under the direction of Colonel PATRICK ROBINSON, aided by Sir CHARLES BRIGHT and Mr. LATIMER CLARKE. The great difficulty in this work was the manufacture and laying of the enormous mass of cable, nearly 1500 miles, and weighing upward of 5000 tons. On the 3d of February, 1864, the laying of the first section, from Fao, which is a Gwadur and Mussendom, a barren promontory to the entrance of the Persian Gulf on the Arabian Sea, was commenced and was completed in the course of a month. On the 25th of March the section between Mussendom and Bushire was completed. The last section—between Bushire and the head of the Persian Gulf at Fao—was completed April 5. We give on page 500 a sketch of the laying of the shore end of the cable at Fao, which is a small Turkish village at the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates. At this point the extreme shallowness of the water for several miles made it necessary to land the cable in boats over a combination of mud and raise, which, however, was effected both difficult and dangerous. The communication by way of the Persian Gulf, which was recently interrupted, has been restored.

CELEBRATION OF THE FOURTH IN PARIS.

WITH more patriotic fervor than ever before does the American abroad now turn his eyes to his own land. We give on page 509 of this number a view of the fête at Pre-Catelan, in Paris, given in honor of our national anniversary by the American residents at Paris. Four hundred persons were present at it. More than seven hundred persons responded to the generous invitation of our Minister, Mr. BIGELOW. The Diplomatic Corps were represented by the single exception of Prince METTERNICH, who was otherwise engaged. There were likewise at the festival descendants of the Revolutionary and BONCHAMPS—families intimately connected with our revolutionary history. With these exception the fête was, as it was meant to be, purely Americ

The company was received by Mr. BIGELOW, assisted by several American gentlemen residents here, and after a considerable portion of the guests had assembled, the Minister made a short and appropriate address of welcome. Later on, speeches were made by Mr. PEYSAM, United States Consul at Paris, Mr. CURTIS, of New York, and Hon. AMOS TUCK, of Boston.

9 AT 10 o'clock in the evening about sixty gentlemen joined in a commemorative dinner. It was served at supper, accompanied with music and speeches, at the restaurant of DESIRE BEAUJAIS, on the Boulevard Poissonière.

A LIFT IN THE WORLD.

WHEN for days, and even weeks, my eyes had rested every morning regularly on the advertisements of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, indited, indeed, only as regards liability), and read the reckless, flaming way in which the advantages of the new combination of life insurance were introduced to the public—spreading over half columns and columns of newspapers, I little thought the day would come when my whole household would be personally connected with that famous speculation. As I read of the four hundred bads they were to "put up," and of the enormous premiums, where the four hundred guests could be feasted; of the ladies' sitting-room, decorated in the most expensive style by Owen Jones; and of the spacious hall, the telegraphy, the "grand stair," the great pond that I must send up my name to leave at, that the magic "lift" which so mysteriously carried human beings up to the top flight of all—I little dreamed that a theatre would be opened for which was to be the scene of a drama full of the strangest and most absorbing interest to me.

Latterly, business, rich, and what not, had necessitated my absence from home for nearly two years. One of the reasons for this prolonged sojourn I must not conceal—I was "in love." Suddenly from a time preceding early youth—I had never been "strong," as it is called—I found myself one night, long after both these stages had been gone through, I had sat up a whole night on the deck of a steamer, with my feelings and my circumstances. It was a romantic night, and the time passed very sweetly indeed; but toward morning bracy drew down upon me, and settled on my chest. In a week "marked pulmonary symptoms" set in, to use my doctor's phrase; and in a month I had been "brought to death's door," to use other phrases, with the exception of confirmed difficulty of breathing. He said it was a tendency to asthma; it struck me as being entitled to all the honors of that description. It soon became so troublesome that I was recommended to go about and travel—which I did.

I came home by the Bay. The morning on which I got down was a "fifty" one, and the sun did not let day outside the harbor. We had to get on board in boats. We got to the boat—we had to descend a very slippery ladder. I got down safely, and saw that a fresh, gay young lady in screams of laughter was following, in that natural embarrassment about her dress which seems always to attend on the operations of ladies descending ladders or compulsory steps. She had a baby-cage on one hand, a parcel of shawls and cloaks in the other, and she came down facing the audience. I ran —that is, got up—to her assistance, kept the dress well down; and though I was rising and falling like a fisherman's float, owing to the rocking of the boat, I fancy I performed a real service. Her dressing-case was stowed away under a bench; with the assistance of a lunch the young lady herself was settled into her seat with much laughter and enjoyment. A few miserable-looking passengers—chastly by anticipation—looking with disgust on the raw sea and open boat, and accepting the ladder as though it were the ladder of a scaffold, were assisted down like sacks, and, after coiling still, began to swirl and roll through the waves.

The little incident of a dressing-case and the descent of the ladder was quite sufficient to justify a traveling intimacy. We were delightfully pleasant during that little voyage to the steamer. She was a hoyden, and wished the sail to be stretched tightly; so when I, the "old salt," was said, "I can scull over." The sailors were inclined to grumble, admiring her spirit and relish for nautical matters. But the elderly passengers, all moody, and whose traveling-caps seemed like the nightcaps of invalids, protested with anger and surliness against such a thing. I "sculled" a little more and more; and when we got to the delicate-looking, airy little steamer which was lying for our use with the huge passenger-ship each other, I thought that she was traveling alone; but it turned out that she was to meet her brother on board, who was to come off with the next open boat with all the luggage. While we waited for him, leaning on the bulwarks of the ship, she with her back turned up, and both of us looking across the sea toward the shore, she told me a few little particulars about her self. Her name was Rosa Darling.

How old was her brother? I asked; that is, Miss Darling's brother?

"Only Rosa," she said. "Scarcely a chaperone," she added, with a burst of laughter; "only a few months from the nursery. There was no harm in it. One could be doing traveling, you know!"

"To be sure," I said. "Darling—Darling!" She started.

"I was repeating your name," I said, smiling. "A charming one—so musical and melodious—Darling! Rosa Darling! I suppose you will change all the way up to town—Darling!" (I put the very slightest phrase of a pause between the two last words.) She was, she looked at me curiously, and burst out laughing.

"You say it so funnily," she said. "I half suspect you are laughing at me. It is not a little fat that I must lose it one day? So they tell me. It's in the natural course of things, you know."

"Incidentally," I said. "You must lose it, Darling—the name, I mean. It would be no more in nature," I added, fervently, "for you to retain that name than for a rose to smell fly backward, or that water to the town over there."

"I wish you had set for a comparison, but this did fairly well.)

"I was very near flying backward down the steps," she said, with a burst of laughter, "only for you."

"Yes," I said. "I believe I had the happiness of saving you, Miss Darling."

"Now," she said, in a grave voice, "I must interdict your using that name of mine, for fear of any mistakes."

"You do me wrong," I said. "Your brother—I was speaking of him. He is a Darling, too, is he not? Of the Darlings, I mean." I added, hastily, amending my speech, for fear she should think I put any one on the same level with herself.

The brother was a boy. He was about as intelligent and as useful as a walking-stick. No better choice could have been made. He might talk all the way up to town if he were silent.

We had a pleasant voyage. The rest of the passengers were very unwell, which contributed a good deal to our pleasantness; for we were both perfectly well, and laughed a good deal at their sufferings. We had a dinner to ourselves in town. To that nice great boat just opened, where they could "put up" four hundred beds, and where there was a "grand staircase" decorated in the most splendid manner by Owen Jones, and where there was a pneumatic hoist which—

"Which you must go down. Had I not heard all this before? and my prospectus-reading of two years occurred to me.

"Yes," I said, "the Grand Metropolitan, Limited, in forty thousand shares of twenty-five dollars each. So much paid up. Why, it was only opened the other day."

"It is a good deal talked of now," said a gentleman who had come down by the plate brother. "It's the finest thing in the city. People go there who don't want to go to a hotel—who are actually at variance with hotels. It is the hotel of the future. It is marvelous the perfection they have brought the thing to. So many thousand tons of water on the roof."

"I think I shall go there too," I said, enthusiastically. "I have a leading second already, but my legacy does not come in such a hurry. Miss Darling—I mean Miss Darling—you to!" She asked me then how long I were to stay in town. I replied, in a indefinite time, that it might stretch from a day to a year. On which she told me that she was going to spend her birthday, until, at least, her uncle came up from the country to fetch her. That would be in a week or ten days, or a fortnight, at the very latest. I said, "Then I, myself, for "in the absence of your excellent uncle, a third person would be of any use to you, or, I should rather say, of you would allow that person to make himself useful to you during your stay in the great metropolis, you would be conferring a favor on him —a real favor, I think," I added, "as the inmate of the same hotel—the probable inmate—he has some claim upon you. In this life, surely we should all help one another a little."

A curious light came into her eyes. She was going to reply favorably, when suddenly she gave a start, half jumped up and clapped her hands. "Why, there he is!" she cried in delight; "Call to him! Stop him! Bring him to me!"

Here was the old uncle. Confusion on him! I went reluctantly to the window, and looked up and down. "I can't see him," I said; "I don't see any one!"

"To be sure there he is," she said, impatiently, and going to the window herself. "There! Mr. Ridley, come here."

A man in a slate-colored tunic, turned up in the worst taste with orange, and carrying a rifle, looked back. He was the planiest creature I ever saw, with quite smooth shaved. He came running up.

"Ah," he said, "is that you? What a surprise!"

"Isn't it?" she said. "And who'd ever have thought of meeting you here? Get in, will you? Of course you will."

"I have got this musket and bag, Government stores, so must be careful, you know; but if you will have us all—"

"I am afraid," I said, "we could scarcely accommodate both you and your weapon. There is a large party coming back, a family—and if they find their seats gone—"

"Stop one, he said; "why didn't they keep them? At all events, you can tell them you did your best to keep them, and that I took them. And as to the rifle, we came pushing in, with his heavy gun and bag, which kept dropping on the ground, to the great risk of our feet.

"There," said he, at last, sitting down between me and her, and fanning his hot tan face with his regimental cap. "There we are, and I'll introduce you nice, I can tell you. Did I ever think, when I turned out of my bed this morning—which, by-the-way, was at five o'clock—that I should be in store for me? I did not, indeed." And he burst into the most objectionable of all laughs, known as the "horse-laugh," or horse-laugh, by reserving his great musket between his knees, and I saw that his fingers were still black with powder.

"Oh," he said, "I am not the last we met—we shall have such fun. And oh, Ridley"—this was the familiar addressing a gentleman by his surname—"Mr. Ridley, I am going to stay with him for a week, at the great new hotel, you know—what do you say to that?"

It will have been observed that all this time I was in a manner passed over; that I had sunk into an inglorious obscurity, being quite ignored by my former prosperity. Feeling this wanton degradation very acutely, I saw an opportunity here, and spoke in:

"You mean the new Metropolitan Hotel Palace Company, Limited, I think?"

"Yes," he said; "it all the same, I believe."

For the first time he looked at me straight, beginning with my sleeves, and so on upward. Presently he whispered to her with a curious smile, and she whispered to him; and when I had finished the whole of the rest of the journey they talked, and chattered, and whispered in this confidential way. Near the end of the journey I had recovered my ungrateful way in which she was behaving to me. After all, I had laid her under some obligation as regards the dressing-case and the descent of the ladder. But it was no matter. When the coarse Ridley got out at stations—which he did at nearly every one to fill what he called his "pockets-full"—we got on again into the old friendly footing. I began to think she was a little intimidated by his presence.

We arrived in the city. I had got my own luggage very quickly, and it lay on the ground beside me. I had also secured the dressing-case, to which I had certainly a little claim from past services. Suddenly the dashed Ridley looked about him. "I needn't," he said. "Here. Give it me. Thank you!"

I resisted this attempt. "I beg your pardon," I said. "I have a sort of claim—have I not?" I said to her, with a half smile.

"Oh, certainly," she said, "how" Uncle bought it for me when I went to school."

"Oh, I don't mean that," I said. "I mean coming out of the boat—you recollect."

"What the devil do you mean?" he said, roughly. "Give the lady her case, confound it;" and with a sudden fit he snatched it from me.

She saw the reproachful look in my face. "I am so much obliged to you," she said; "I mistook, you know."

Here was the carriage. They got in. I stood by, waiting, looking with a steamy expression at the seat. "We are all going to the same hotel," I said, "the Metropolitan Palace, Limited—not as regards the accommodation, I hope," I added, "indeed," repeating my little joke to mollify him.

"Exactly," he said; "I think we have ever; but we are full. Would you tell the fellow Metropolitan Hotel?"

"I see there is one vacant place," I said, re proachfully to her.

"Go on," he called; and they did go on.

We went to the same hotel. I was ravishingly with the appearance of the proportions and decorations. But that was only the first feeling. At other, and another of another order, I began to feel uncomfortable immediately. That feeling was be—or she (which should it be?). The fatal dressing-case, and the more fatal descent of the ladder, into the boat had done its work, and had made me more or less indifferent to Going Jones and his splendors. I was far more interested in what had been "put up," and even to that "hoist" or "lift" which moved by hydraulic power.

Ah! The lift. I am coming to that now. I used to meet her constantly. In the morning. In the evening. In the hall. In the great dining-room (where I never could get placed near her). She was always kind and good to me; but she was always with that Ridley. I was inclined to believe now that the odious fellow exercised a terrorism over her, the effect of which she had too much self-respect to show me. He called her Rosa, so was Tommy. She was living there; so was I. I may as well confess it now, I used to lie in wait for her in the hall, on all manner of flimsy pretexts; either until she came down, or came in, or came up. But whether she came down or came in, somehow that Ridley fellow always contrived to thrust himself upon her. By some intriguing he managed to sit beside her at the dinners. No doubt she rebelled against this tyranny and persecution. Meanwhile, my life was becoming almost intolerable from agitation and struggle, and I felt it must end in some way—not life, but the state of things generally.

I have spoken of coming up and of going down; and I have avoided hitherto coming down to the portion of the narrative. There hangs thereby more than would be conceived—more certainly hangs than the whole chamber which the mysterious agency of science, as manifested in the hydraulic apparatus, raised to so many times its height. But there was yet another meaning in it. She, like most other guests, could hold herself of it. Am I following now? And when I was lying in wait, as I may call it, in the hall, I confess to a little artifice. When she had entered the apparatus and was to emerge, feign having forgotten a pocket-handkerchief or some other article, and would be transported in her delightful society up to the top. I was charming; I could have gone up and down from year's end to year's end without ever getting out. But, of course, could not do that. It is all all came to an end, and the lift—accursed invention—was at the bottom of it. I mean morally. Here are the particulars:

The very first journey we had made together he was there too, looking at me with undisguised insolence and baleful joy. She had noticed it, with great laughing and clapping of hands,

"I say, Ridley, Ridley! What a place to make a proposal in! Fancy two people shut up here together!"

He laughed loudly. "A good idea," he said; "worth making a note of."

"Not at all a bad idea," I said from a corner of the "lift."

He looked at me as he always did when I spoke.

"The only difficulty," he said, "is, that under certain circumstances it is absurd to provide for two people to get the opportunity of being alone. There are busy-bodies who will be always sticking themselves in where they are not wanted, and to whom, I think, for the good of the house even, I must give a lesson."

"Ah ha!" I said, smiling, "so despotic a course would scarcely be tolerated. The lift, as we all know, is public. Like a weighing-machine or the apparatus at Reading, any impertinent might was well shut up as introduce any restriction of the kind you allude to." He bowed, acknowledging his defect of my quiet retort. She laughed too. "You see," I said to her, "his plan would scarcely answer."

"I shall think of something that will, though," he said.

In a few days, however, there was a curious change. When she came into the hall with him, and while I was lying in wait until she should have entered the lift, she suddenly turned and said, "Oh, that machine is too troublesome. The stairs are twice as fast. What do you say to a race, Ridley?" And off she bounded, with that person in pursuit. For the moment my instinct was to follow also; but a few steps at a rapid pace soon showed me that I must stop. With a determination of action developed itself in a second, and at the end of the first flight I was panting in deep distress.

I give love to say that, under the instigation of Ridley, she carried out his unworthy tactics steadily on every occasion. They always went up by the stairs, and, as a matter of habit, avoided the lift. I had to make solitary journeys by the hydraulic agency. One evening, however, I found that the lift was no longer. I said to myself that it must come to a crisis one way or the other. Which was the one way or which was the other way I did not know and did not care; but the way should be discovered. As I was brooding over this the idea suddenly flashed upon me. What if the pulley-rope in question were not so confirmed? What if I braved its effects—tried—went into training a little? I might baffle it, and be once more on equal terms with the enemy.

I almost at once began to act on the suggestion; with a little practice I found my power of endurance improving marvelously. I progressed in a steady ratio. To my surprise, I found that shortly I could effect two flights of stairs on one day I could manage three on the following day. This promised well. And, the better to carry out my design, I determined to keep my training, as I might call it, a secret until I was perfect. Just as I was nearly perfect—which was on a Saturday—the news came to me that she was going away, that her uncle had written for her, and that she must leave by the four o'clock train. She did not tell me this herself, but I overheard her telling it to her Ridley friend. No time, therefore, was to be lost. Whatever I had to do had best be done, if it were to be done, done quickly. This is not the precise form of words used by the immortal Wellington; but it conveys his idea pretty accurately. In a moment I had the plan settled. Nearly the whole day I waited in or about the hall for her to come in. I had determined, in a word—barring in mind the remark so disparaging to a faint heart—to be bold and speak. I was in ambuscade, I say, the whole day, in or about the hall, rushing out of concealment whenever I heard any one coming. I believe the young lady who looked after the books and accounts at first thought I had designs on the property under her care, but afterward fancied I was a little "touched in the upper story." I could almost laugh at this notion now, for the upper story had something to do with my troubles.

Two—three—still she did not come. Surely she would pack? At least, if she trusted to a disorderly huddling up of her clothes, "any how," she was scarcely the girl I took her for. Now, of course she had packed already. Ah, she was hurrying in just in time—I ran to her.

"I Could you spare me a few moments—a hurried interview," I said, much agitated, "before you go? Five minutes would be sufficient."

"Bless you, my dear Sir, I haven't five seconds. I must be at the train at four."

"Three minutes, then," I said with reproach, "two—one! how hard you were talked to on latterly, and I did think, after the dressing-case and the lobster—"

"I assure you," she said, "I meant nothing—never intended it, at least."

"No," said I, "it wasn't you. I know perfectly well who put you up—"

She colored a little.

"Poisoned me!"

"Let me," said I, passionately, "let me go up with you, and speak what I have to say as we go up. I can go stairs now. I have learned how—"

"Go up stairs now?" she said, looking at me with wonder.

"Yes," I went on, "I have been training myself secretly, when you little thought what I was about. I began with one flight, then, emboldened by success, two and three.

There was a rush behind me. "Bless you," he said, "you haven't twenty minutes to get to the train. There are the boxes and things!"

"All ready," she said. "I am just going up stairs, and shall be down in a minute."

"Up stairs!" he said; "isn't there the lift? We won't mind it," he added, laughing, "as it is the last time, and, besides, I have something to tell you privately."

I looked at her bitterly.

"You'll say you'd take the stairs; but no matter." I turned to go.

"Do come," he said, taking her hand and drawing her to the lift. "I shall be very sorry, Sir, for God's sake keep off, and stop worrying us."

She went with him. Suddenly she turned, and said to me in a kind voice, "I am sorry to disappoint you, but if you have any thing to tell, or any message, you can go round by the stairs, and meet me at the top."

A capital idea. I gave her a look of intelligence to show that I understood the terrorism under which she was acting.

He slammed the door of the apparatus. They began to ascend, and I turned round and began what was literally for me a terrific and daring ascent. I was racing against time. I took three stairs at each stride. I knew there were four hundred in all. When I had done about two-thirds of the way I began to feel signs of distress. I was gasping, and had still half to go. But the lift was going was failing me—my false, faithless, treacherous training. They would be gone—he down even before me. But I kept on.

At last I was at the top, and O joy! there was she waiting patiently on the landing. She saw me come in—panting, blowing, drooping, with my head on one side, and my tongue hanging out. I could not have smiled forward, I suppose, if I would, for a balluster. Her face was all lit up with pleasure and delight and sympathy.

"Now," said she, "I can give you a minute, while Mr. Ridley has gone to see about the trunks. What do you want?"

"You!" I gasped out, with a sort of blow and guggle.

"Me?" she said, starting back.

"Yes," I said, "you must have—seen—it—long a-go—O my—(I shall never get over it! Early pulmonary. Deck of a vessel!)—I have a good constitution, and shall make you ha—ha—happy. O, I have no wi-nd—"

She burst out laughing. "My dear Sir, this is so kind and flattering, and I assure you I appreciate it. But it is unfortunate; you are a little bit late; O over so little!"

"Late!" I feebly, holding my side, and gasping.

"Yes," said she, "Mr. Ridley has been a little before you."

"Before me!" I cried, starting back. "When? Where? How?"

"Only two seconds ago," she said, leaning down her head, but from a different cause to that which affected mine. "He has just proposed for me—in the lift."

"In THE LIFT!" I cried, with a stamp. "O infernal hydraulic power! O wretched apparatus!"

"Good by," she said, as she went on; "if I had gone up by the stairs with you, it perhaps might never have occurred. Every hotel should have 'a lift.'"

ALLIGATORS AND CROCODILES.

I HAD lately in my hands no less than three live specimens of the crocodile tribe, from South America, which I bought as alligators. They, however, turned out to be not true alligators, but the American crocodile. Any body can procure these little creatures, about as long as a soup-ladle, and as thick as a good-sized carrot. When warm they are very active, and scamper across the floor like elongated rats. I sometimes placed them on the hearth-rug, when they invariably took forty winks. During their nap I used to tickle them on the head, and they would open their mouths and cry "Don't, don't," as plain as possible. I had intended showing them as "talking crocodiles," in opposition to the "talking fish." When caught, they lashed their tails furiously from side to side, and snapped smartly with their long jaws. One of them, indeed, gave me a bite, but it did not hurt much, as their teeth were not very long, though as sharp as needles. They seemed very affectionate, and when one moved away the other looked up, and seeing his friend en route, sounded a march also. When in their cage (an aquarium) they had a fight for the saucer containing warm water (for the saucer would not hold two), and when they had settled this material point, they lay as quiet as "the babes in the wood," with a bit of loose flannel as a coverlet. One morning one of the little creatures died, in spite of every attention and care; for she had seen little bits of minced raw rump-steak for her supper the night before, and a comfortable warm bed before the kitchen fire. A letter had been sent a few days before by an amateur naturalist, to say that "she had a tortoise as her pet, and that the tortoise lately had not been very well, and she thought it was pining to love; where could she obtain a mate for it?" Keeping this in mind, I watched to see the gentleman crocodile would pine in love when his wife died. He must have been a hard-hearted brute, for he did not show the least symptoms of sadness; rather, on the contrary, I fancied that sometimes he cast an eye rather of hunger than of grief upon the deceased relict. I am not at all sure but that he was not "in two minds" whether he should not make a sly meal of her in my absence, and so answer to the character given me by "Robinson Crusoe," an old one-armed salt of my acquaintance, who, when describing his travels, with a high relish informed me, "Ah, Sir, there New Zealanders is rum chaps; when they have done with their wives they eats 'em." At the time I write the lizard is still residing alive and well, but I think he is more disagreeable and ill-tempered than he was. There is one great consolation, that he has not to fight with any other saucer every night at bedtime: he has it all to himself. A day or two afterward I learnt that another alligator arrived by the same ship, but I have no means to keep the stranger company; but when I visited him, I saw at once that my pair would do, as the new arrival was much too big to be a companion to my little fellow; for what chance would a fourteen-inch crocodile have against a three-foot crocodile, if they happened to have a row together? The big one would possibly have swallowed up the little one, who doubtless would have "disagreed" with him internally as well as externally. So I resolved to keep him, and try to fatten him, and, when fat, an not sure but that I should be a party of scientific friends and eat him myself.

And now, what is the difference between an alligator and a crocodile? I really do not know an answer better than that of the sailor when he said, "About the same difference between an attorney and a solicitor," although, of course, I do not join in the sweeping conclusion of the honest tar's simile, "They are all varmint together!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A NEW-MADE justice of the peace, into whose office some dozen of his neighbors had followed a constable with a warrant in charge, to have the magistrate would fulfill his duty, determined to strike them dumb with awe. He sentenced the prisoners to twenty-one days' imprisonment, and concluded with all possible solemnity: "And the Lord have mercy on your sinful soul!"

A rich Philadelphia contractor, in a severe fit of the gout, said his physician he suffered the pains of the damned. "Not exactly, answered," Whist, sleepy!"

An Irish Presbyterian clergyman once broke off the thread of his discourse, and thus addressed his congregation: "I see, my friends, that we have all got here, but now just half through with my sermon; but, as I perceive your impatience, I will say that the remaining half is not more than a quarter as long as that you have had."

BOY IN GRAMMAR CLASS. — "Of what gender is Thomas?" "Thomas is of the masculine gender." "What gender is Susan?" "Susan is of the crinoline gender, of course."

A clergymen called on a poor parishioner, whom he found bitterly bewailing the loss of an only son, a boy of about four or five years old. "Ah, Sir," said the weeping woman, "I cannot help thinking that 'one so young could not have committed any very grievous sin;' and that he must have gone to heaven!" "O, yes," said the simple-hearted creature, "I feel Tommy was in sin—and they are all struggling to get there!"

THE VALUE OF FAME.—A good story was told by Thackeray, who, while travelling, staid at an inn, and it soon became known to the rest of the company who he was, and in consequence he was frequently pointed out by those who recognized him by those who did not. Upon one occasion he heard the same said by a visitor, "That's the great Thackeray." "Is it?" said the visitor; "what has he done?" "Blessed if I know," said the waiter.

SPEED, THE — A gentleman who had long been subject to the accidental visitation of thieves in his grounds, wishing to preserve his property without the embarrassing agency of one's life, procured from a hospital the arm of a subject, which he placed on a pole, with a steel trap in his garden, and next morning sent the crier round the town to announce that the owner of the left arm of the late Mr. —'s ground last night might receive it upon application." An artist of some eminence has recently given his notions of the characteristics of color. He says white signifies purity, blue, fidelity, etc., etc., but appears to be in certain error in one point. He speaks of yellow as indicative of domestic trouble. We always thought blue the favorite color for the domestic brown of trouble.

A poor woman called at a grocer's the other day and asked for a quart of vinegar. It was measured off and put into her bottle and jug. She then asked for another quart to be put into the same vessel. "And why not ask for half a gallon and done with it?" "Oh! I lose more than half of a soul," answered she, "if a for two answers."

EPITAPH ON MR. MILES.

This tombstone is a milestone.—Hah! how so?
Because beneath lies Miles.—Why! quite right.
A little man he was, a dwarf in size,
But now quadrupled out, at least Miles long he lies.
His grave, though small, contains a space so wide,
It has Miles in breadth, and Miles in length besides.

A doctor having returned a coat to his tailor, which it declared would not fit, was met by the latter at a future time two days after, and was then addressed: "Ah, doctor, you are a happy man!" "Why so?" replied the other. "Why, because you never have any of your bad work returned on your hands," directing his customer's attention at the same time to the grave.

COMETH CRABB.—Pretty shop girls.

An advertisement appeared in a morning paper requesting a young lady who had eloped, which contained as follows: "She is most earnestly requested to return to her disconsolate parents; but if she does not choose to comply with the foregoing request, she is earnestly desired to send the key of the tea-chest."

A NEW LIGHT FOR DEITIES.—Composition candles.

A FAREWELL.

I scorn the transient thought I had
To stand aloof from Life's great fight,
Thy gentle precepts teach me what
Is manly, brave, and right.

Yes! I will to myself "be true,"
Unconquered by my ceaseless pain,
Remembring that, though Joy be gone,
Still Duty doth remain.

How sweet it is to love, my soul
Already known too well, too well;
How sweeter to be loved, alas!
My life will never tell.

But there's a nobler aim for each
Than the poor goal of his desires—
It is to follow out those thoughts
The voice of God inspires:

To bid farewell, with stern resolve,
To every sweet, fond, selfish plan,
And only strive to bring to light
The Godlike in the man.

In this sad, busy March of Life
It is the weakest sink and fall;
"Be up and doing!" ever is
The Leader's bugle-call.

I would not bind thy life to mine;
Thou art too pure, sweet girl, for me;
I ought not wish for bliss that might
Bring wretchedness to thee.

Though love, for me, is nothing but
An unfulfilled and broken dream,
It lights my path so bright I may Find heaven by its gleam.

And so farewell—If any man
Should win that love denied to me,
I'll try not envy his bright lot,
But only think of thee.

CHAPTER XXXI.

ABOUT SWITZERLAND.

YOUR English match-maker is, for the most part, a comfortable matron, plump, good-natured, kindly, with a turn for sentiment and diplomacy. She has "The Etiquette of Courtship and Love" at her fingers' ends; and gives copies of that invaluable little manual to her young friends as soon as they are engaged. When the storm is dull, she amuses herself by reading the solemnization of matrimony. She delights in novels that have a great deal of love in them, and reads Miss Bremer at least once than Mr. Thackeray. To patch up lovers' quarrels, to pave the way for a proposal, to propitiate reluctant guardians, are offices in which, for very soul rejoices; and, like the death-bed hog in the Bride of Lammermoor who avenged all her fellow-creatures from a professional point of view, seeing "a bonny corpse" in every fine young man about that country-side, she beholds only bridegrooms and brides elect in the very children of her friends, when they come home for the holidays.

Lady Arabella Walkingshaw was an enthusiastic match-maker. She had married off her own daughter with brilliant success; and, being a real lover of the art of matrimony, delighted "to keep her hand in" among the young people of her acquaintance. What wilful woe to Miss Battle match-making was to Lady Arabella Walkingshaw. "It was her business, her duty, what she came into the world to do." She went about it scientifically. She had abstruse theories with respect to eyes, complexions, ages, and Christian names; and even plunged into unknown physiological depths on the subject of races, genealogies, tics of connection, and hereditary characteristics. In short, she constructed her model matches after a private ideal of her own. But here was not altogether a sentimental case even a physiological ideal. She was essentially a woman of the world, and took an interest quite as deep, if not direct, in the pairing of fortunes as of faces. To introduce an income of ten thousand a year to a dowry of fifty thousand pounds, and unite the two sums in the books (and settlements) of wedlock, was to Lady Arabella an enterprise of overpowering interest. She would play for such a result as eagerly and passionately as if her own happiness depended on the cards, and the stakes were for her own winning.

With such a hobby kept perpetually saddled in the chamber of her imagination, it was not surprising that the sight of Saxon Trefalden, leading Miss Hatherton down to dance should have sufficed to send Lady Arabella off at a canter.

"What a charming match that would be!" said she to Mrs. Bunyon. Mrs. Bunyon was the wife of the handsome Bishop, tall, aristocratic-looking, and many years his junior. Both ladies were standing near their hostess, and she was still welcoming the coming guest.

"Do you think so?" said Mrs. Bunyon, doubtfully. "I don't see why."

"My dear Mrs. Bunyon—two such splendid fortunes!"

"The less reason that either should marry for money," replied the Bishop's wife. "Besides, look at the difference of ages!"

"Not more than five years," said Lady Arabella.

"But it would be five years on the wrong side. What do you say, Lady Castletowers—would they make a desirable couple?"

"I did not hear the names," replied Lady Castletowers, with one of her most gracious smiles.

"We were speaking," said the match-maker, "of Miss Hatherton and Mr. Trefalden."

The smile vanished from Lady Castletowers's lip.

"I should think it a most injudicious connection," she said, coldly. "Mr. Trefalden is a mere boy, and has no prestige beyond that of wealth."

"But fortune is position," said Lady Arabella, defending her ground inch by inch, and thinking, perhaps, of her own marriage.

"Miss Hatherton has fortune, and may therefore aspire to more than mere wealth in a matrimonial choice," replied the Countess, with a slightly heightened color, and dropped the conversation.

Mrs. Bunyon and Lady Arabella exchanged glances and a "covert smile. Moving on presently with the stream, they passed out of Lady Castletowers's hearing, and returned to the subject.

"Their united fortunes," pursued Lady Arabella, "would amount to five millions, if not more. Only conceive it—FIVE MILLIONS!"

"You shall meet with no sympathy from Lady Castletowers," said the Bishop's wife, significantly.

"Evidently not. Though, if there were really a coronet in prospect—"

"I think there is a coronet in prospect," said Mrs. Bunyon.

Lady Arabella shook her head.

"No more than there is a crown matrimonial," said she. "I am a close observer of young people, and I know quite well what direction the Earl's inclinations take."

"Indeed!"

"He is never head and ears in love with Mademoiselle Colonna, is he? Lady Arabella, confidentially. "And has been for years."

"Does Lady Castletowers know it?"

"I think not."

"And do you suppose they are secretly engaged?"

"Oh dear, no! Mademoiselle Colonna, I believe, discourages his attentions—greatly to her credit."

"It is a marriage that would be highly distasteful to Lady Castletowers," observed Mrs. Bunyon.

"It would break her heart," said Lady Arabella.

"She is ambitious."

"—and poor. Poor as a mouse."

If Lady Castletowers had not been a Countess, a Hôtel-Dieu, and the daughter of an Earl, Lady Arabella Walkingshaw could scarcely have forgiven her this fact. She was one of that large majority to whom poverty is a crime.

In the mean while Miss Hatherton had found excited Saxon could not dance, but, when the first shyness of introduction had worn off, could actually talk as well. So she set herself to draw him out, and his naïveté amused her excessively.

"I don't mean to let you hand me to a seat, and get rid of me, Mr. Trefalden," said she, when the quadrille was over, and the dancers were promenading up and down the hall. "You must sit down in Miss Englefield's place, and talk to me. I want you to tell me ever so much more about Switzerland."

"I am glad to find any one who cares to hear about it," said Saxon. "It is a subject of which I am never weary."

"I dare say not. I only wonder how you can endure this life of tinsel and glitter after the liberty of the mountains. Are you not disgusted with the insipidity and frivolity of fashionable society?"

Saxon looked at her with dismay.

"What do you mean?" said he. "The world here has been very kind to me. I never dreamed that its smiles were false or its kindness insincere."

Miss Hatherton laughed.

"Well, I find it out," said she, "when you've lived in it a little longer."

"I hope not. I should be very unhappy if I thought it."

"Well, then, don't think so. Enjoy your illusions as long as you can. I have outlived mine long ago. But I'm not here to let us talk of something pleasanter—of Switzerland. Have you ever hunted the chamois?"

"Hunted what?"

"How charming! High up, I suppose, among the snows?"

"Among the snows, along the edges of precipices, across the glaciers—wherever the chamois could spring, and the hunter follow!" replied Saxon, with enthusiasm.

"That's really dangerous sport, is it not?" said Miss Hatherton.

"It is less dangerous, of course, to the practiced mountaineer than to one who is new to the work. But there can be no real sport without danger."

"Why so?"

"Because sport without danger is mere slaughter. The risks ought never to be all on the side of a helpless beast."

"That is just and generous," said Miss Hatherton, warmly.

Saxon blushed, and looked uncomfortable.

"I have not only been over a glacier, but down a crevasse after a chamois many a time," said he, hurriedly. "I shot one this very spring, as he stood upon an ice-ridge, between two chasms. I ought not to have done it. I ought to have waited till he was on a more open spot; but, having him well within range, I brought him down. When I reached the spot, however, there was my chamois wedged half-way down a deep, blue, crush-looking crevasse—and I had no alternative but to get him out or leave him."

"So you cut steps in the ice, as one sees in the pictures in the Alpine-club books!"

"No; I simply tied the cord that every mountaineer carries round the stock of my rifle, fixed the gun firmly across the mouth of the chasm, and let myself down. Then I tied another cord round my chamois, and when I had reached the spot again I drew him up after me. Nothing is easier. A child can do it, if he is used to the ice and is not afraid. In all glacier work it is only the rash and the timid who are in danger."

"And what other sport do you get?" asked Miss Hatherton. "Are there any eagles about the mountains of the Grisons?"

"Not so many as there used to be. I have not shot more than five or six within these last three years; but I robbed many an eagle's nest when I was a boy. Then, you know, we have the steinbok, and in winter the wolf; and sometimes we get the chance of a brown bear."

"Here you ever shot a bear, Mr. Trefalden?" said Miss Hatherton, intensely interested.

"I have shot two," replied Saxon, with a flush of boyish pride, "and made sledge-rugs of their skins. You have never been in Switzerland?"

"Oh yes, I have," replied Miss Hatherton; "but only in the beaten tracks, and under the escort of a courier, like a maniac with a keeper."

"Ah, you really know nothing of the country," said Saxon. "Neither of the country nor the people. The Switzerland that the Swiss loves is that wild, free, upper region where there are neither hotels nor hotels, tourists nor guides; but only dark pine forests and open plateaux, the haunt of the marmot, the ptarmigan, and the chamois."

"I never saw but one chamois," said Miss Hatherton, "and that was a poor fat melancholy creature, in a large park."

"Of course you never visited Switzerland in the winter?"

"Oh dear, no."

"And yet that is the most glorious time of all, when the plateaux are all sheeted with snow, and the great peaks rise above them like marble obelisks, and even the pines stand out white against the deep blue sky."

"What an enthusiast you are!" laughed Miss Hatherton.

"I love my country," replied Saxon.

"You need not tell me that. But what can you do in winter, snowed up in those wild valleys?"

"We are not snowed up. We have sledges; and the deeper the snow lies on the roads and passes the better the sledges fly along. You should see the Rheinthal between Chur and Thusis, on a bright day in the depth of winter, when the sledges are going in the sunshine, and the air is full of the music of the bells."

"How delightful!"

"Indeed it is delightful. Then we also skate, practice with the rifle, carve wooden toys, and attend to the winter work of our farms; and sometimes, if there is a wolf or a wild boar about the neighborhood, we have a great hunt by torchlight. Winter is the time for Switzerland! Ask any Swiss who is not a townsman, and he will tell you the same story."

"I suppose you mean to go back there some day?" said Miss Hatherton.

"Go back!" echoed Saxon. "Why, of course I do. It is my—my country—my home!"

"Then if I were to come some Christmas to Chur would you be very kind to me, and show me some of these winter sports?"

"That I would!" exclaimed Saxon. "And I would buy the loveliest Canadian sledge for you that money could purchase; and you should see a boar hunt by torchlight; and a Schützen Fest; and a wrestling match; and I would find you a young chamois to pet. Above all, you would know my dearest father, and if you loved Switzerland for no other reason, you would love it for his sake."

"Your father?" said Miss Hatherton. "I had no idea that he was living."

"He is my uncle," replied the young man; "but my father by adoption. He is a Lutheran pastor—a simple country pastor; but as simple as a child, and as pious as an apostle."

"I hear you are terribly learned yourself, Mr. Trefalden," said Miss Hatherton, rising abruptly. "But what is this they are going to do—a waltz? Do you waltz?"

"Try and not," said Saxon, merrily. "It is our national dance—the only dance I ever knew, till I learned these hideous quadrilles a few weeks ago."

In another moment he had encircled the heiress's waist with his arm, and was flying round the hall with her in those smooth, swift circles which no dancers, however good, can execute like the Swiss peasants. Miss Hatherton was delighted; for she valued a good partner above all things, and Saxon was the best waltzer in the room.

She would willingly have danced and talked with him all the rest of the evening; for Miss Hatherton's tastes were unusual, and cared very little for the remarks of lookers-on; while Saxon, pleased with her blunt candidity, and with the equal relation they gone on waltzing, and praising a Swiss life, till it was time to hand her to her carriage. But this was not to be. Lady Castletowers, who, in her quality of hostess, always knew what her guests were doing, was by no means disposed to permit any such proceeding; so she dispatched her son to dance with the heiress, and, having sent for Saxon, herself detained him over to Miss Colonna for the next quadrille.

By this time the arrivals were over, and the departures had begun; and after supper was served the rooms cleared rapidly. By two o'clock all were gone, save those guests who remained for the night, and of these there were about a dozen.

Then Viscount and Lady Esher, who had brought valet and maid in their suite, retired to the stately apartments prepared for their reception; and the young men all went down to the Earl's smoking-room; and the Colonnas, instead of going to bed, like the rest of the guests, repaired to the little study in the turret. They had much to talk over. Mr. Thompson, the liberal merchant, had brought them information of Garibaldi, and a packet of letters from friends in London and Turin; Miss Hatherton and Mr. Walkingshaw had promised contributions to the fund; and Mrs. Bunyon had undertaken to distribute some clothes, and fill up a card among her friends. With the Eshers and Lord Rochhill there was, of course, nothing to be done. Like Lady Castletowers, they looked upon liberty as a vulgar institution, and upon patriots in general as doubtful characters.

The quarters read, and such entries made as were necessary, the father and daughter rose to say good-night.

"You have done nothing yet, Olimpia," said the Italian. "Here is the fourth day already gone."

"I know it."

"I have talked with him once or twice about our country's cause, and he listens willingly; but I have purposely abstained from doing more. The work is yours—why do you delay it?"

"I will start directly I can," replied Olimpia, impatiently; "I will begin it to-day."

"He is so rich," said Colonna, "and Italy so poor; and every letter we receive is a prayer for help!"

"You need not urge me. Have I not said to-day? and see—the gray is already in the sky!"

She bade him good-night abruptly, and went along the silent corridors to her own room, far away. But the gray had paled to white, and the white had turned to sunlight, before she took the flowers from her hair, or the bracelets from her arms, or even seemed to remember that it would be well to seek an hour or two of sleep. When she did, then, that which at last she threw herself, half dressed, upon the bed, her eyes looked worn and hollow, and her cheek scarcely less white than the pillow against which it was laid?

CHAPTER XXXII.

HOW SAXON IMPROVED THE WEATHER-COCK AT CASTLETOWERS.

"WHAT the deuce can we do to amuse all these people?" said Lord Castletowers to Major Vaughan, as they sat on the terrace before the first morning after the party. "The Eshers, I know, go early, and my mother will take care of the ladies; but how are we to get rid of all the house, none of whom are likely to leave before night. What is to be done?"

"Billiards."

"Well enough for an hour or two; but après?"

"We might ride over to Guildford, and beat up the quarters of those forty-second men who were here last night."

"Impossible. There are only five ridinghorses in the stables, including yours and Trefalden's; and I haven't even guns enough to take them out shooting; if there were any thing to shoot, except rooks—which there isn't!" said the Earl, in desperation.

"Then I don't know what we can do, unless we put on the fire-escape. But here comes the Arcadian; perhaps he can suggest something."

The Arcadian meant Saxon, who, in a subsequent that had befallen him of late, no one knew how. The difficulty was no sooner explained to him than he proposed a new idea.

"Let us organize a Volks-fest in the Swiss fashion," said he. "We can shoot at a mark, sing, and run foot-races; and invite the ladies to award the prizes."

"A famous idea!" exclaimed the Earl. "The very thing! By Jupiter, cool day like this!"

"We must choose a space of level sward to begin with," said the major, "and improvise a grand stand for the ladies."

"And elect an umpire," said Saxon.

And he was up once more, and off the Earl. "I will give the bronze copy in the library—it is an antique from Pompeii."

"And I my gold pistols," said Saxon.

"And I—Bah! I am such a poor devil," said Vaughan. "I possess nothing of any value except my rifle and my horse."

"The best riches of a soldier, Major Vaughan," said Mademoiselle Colonna. "But may I ask why this parliament is being held upon the stairs?"

She had just come, unheard, along the carpeted corridor, and stood waiting a few steps higher than the trio in consultation. She wore a delicate gray dress of some soft material, trimmed with black velvet, and a little linen collar fastened at the throat by a circular brooch of Roman gold. Behind her stood the relic of a once-romantic; while, through the uppermost roses of a huge Gothic window that reached from nearly the top to the bottom of the dark oak staircase, a stream of vivid sunshine poured down upon her head, so that she stood in the midst of it, in her pale, proud beauty, as if inclosed in a pillar of light.

The three men looked up, dazzled, almost breathless, as if in presence of some glorified apparition; and for a moment none replied.

Mademoiselle Colonna, after waiting, with her fine womanly instinct, the spell by which they were bound, moved a step lower out of the sunshine, and said:

"All silent? Nay, then, I fear it is not a parliament but a plot."

"It is a plot, rejoined Vaughan. "We are planning some out-of-door sports for this afternoon's entertainment. Will you be our Queen of Beauty, and graciously condescend to distribute the prizes?"

The Earl colored up, and bit his lip impatiently.

"Vaughan's promptitude," said he, "bears hardly upon those whose wit or audacity is less ready at command. I had myself intended to solicit this grace at Miss Colonna's hands."

"The race, my dear fellow, is to the swift, and the battle to the strong, in the affairs of life," replied Vaughan, carelessly. "But what says our sovereign lady?"

"That the dames not pledge her royal word too hastily. Mine, you know, is not an honorary secretaryship; and I know not well what this morning's post may bring for my pen. Besides, I must hear what arrangements Lady Castlemoves may have in contemplation."

"I don't think my mother will make any that shall deprive us of the light of her countenance on such an important occasion," said the Earl. "But there goes the gong. We must adjourn this debate till after breakfast."

Lady Castlemoves was pleased to approve her son's scheme, and promised not only to honor the course with her presence at half past two o'clock, but to bring with her two young ladies who had slept at the house and were to have been driven home early in the morning. These were the daughters of a poor clergyman who lived about twelve miles off, and, being very young and timid, looked up to the stately Countess as though she were the queen of heaven. Miss Colonna, being urged thereto by Lady Castlemoves herself, was induced to accept the royal office; and, although Viscount and Lady Eslesmere, of course, too magnificent to alter their plans, left the house very early that hour before shortly after breakfast, the patronage of the little fête promised to be quite brilliant enough to stimulate the ambition of the candidates.

It was a happy thought, and gave ample occupation to every body concerned. There were six young men in that day at Castlemoves House: Sir Charles Burgoyne, Major Vaughan, and Saxon Trefalden, all of these six were Hon. Fulham Hay, of Baliol College, Oxford; the Hon. Edward Brandon; Lieutenant Frank Torrington, of the Fourth Lancers; Lord Greenville, of the Peregrine office; and two brothers named Sydney and Robert Pulteney, belonging, as yet, to no any profession whatever. The last was not "the making" of one really prominent man among the whole half-dozen. These were not, perhaps, more than commonly clever men; but they were, for all that, a by no means indifferent specimen lot of the stuff of which English gentlemen are made. They were all of patrician blood—all honorable, good-natured, good-looking, manly young fellows, who had been brought up to ride, speak the truth, and respect the game-laws. They dressed perfectly, and talked in terms to admiration. They spoke that conventional dialect which passes for good English in good society, and expressed themselves with that epigrammatic neatness that almost sounds like wit, and comes naturally to men who have been educated at a great university and belong to a crack regiment or a government office, or a Pall Mall club. And they were all dancing men, and nearly all members of the Cavendish. Of the whole set the Hon. Edward Brandon was the most indifferent specimen of the genus homo; yet even he, though short-sighted and dull, did his work tolerably, and, however poorly off for muscle, had as much "pluck" as many a better man.

The whole breakfast-party hailed the scheme with enthusiasm, and even Signor Colonna said he would go down to see the running. Prizes were freely subscribed over the breakfast-table. Lady Castlemoves promised a curious yataghan that had belonged to Lord Raglan, and been given to her late husband by a member of the poet's family; Signor Colonna offered an Elzevir Horace, with an autograph of Napoleon on the title-page; and the competitors united in making up a purse of twenty guineas, to be run for in a one-horse chay, and handed over by the winner to Miss Colonna for the Italian fund. After the young men, they dispatched their breakfasts with the rapidity of school-boys on a holiday morning, and were soon hard at work upon the necessary preparations.

To choose and measure a smooth amphitheatre of sward about half a mile from the house, set up a winning-post for the races, a target for the marksmen, and a temporary grand stand for the spectators, was work enough for more than the four hours and a half that lay between ten and half past two; but these amateur workmen, assisted by the village carpenter and his mate, as well as by all the grooms, gardeners, and coachmen that could be got together, worked with so good a will that the ground was ready a full hour and three-quarters before the time. The grand stand alone was a triumph of ingenuity. It consisted of a number of kitchen tables severally lashed together, on which were placed a carpet and some chairs, the whole structure being surmounted by a canopy formed of a brick cloth suspended to a tree and a couple of tall stakes.

Having gone once over the course at a "slinging" pace in the ground, the young men returned to the house at one o'clock, furiously hungry and in tremendous spirits.

Castlemoves had ordered luncheon to be prepared for them in the smoking-room, and there, laughing, talking, eating, and drinking all at once, they made out the programme of the games.

"What shall we begin with?" said the Earl, pencil in hand. "We must end, of course, with the one-mile race, and I think we ought to take the rifle work first, before running has made our hands less steady."

"Of course. Rifles first, by all means," replied three or four voices together.

"Names, then, if you please. Now, gentlemen, who goes in for the bronze cup at eight hundred yards?"

"On what conditions?" asked one of the luncheoners.

"The usual conditions. Five shots each, at eight hundred yards; ordinary Enfield rifle; Wimbledon scoring, that is to say, outer, two; centre, three; bull's-eye, four."

"Eight hundred's rather long practice for outsiders," said another man, immersed at the moment in chicken-pie.

"If we had small bores I should put it down at a thousand," replied the Earl; "but there's only one in the house.

The man with the pie was heard to'd mutter something unintelligible about the abundance of gooseberries; but being instantly choked by his nearest neighbor, relapsed into moody silence. In the mean while the Earl continued to canvass for competitors.

"Count," said he, "this will never do. I have only three names yet—Burgoyne, Torrington, and Vaughan. Whom else? I can't enter myself for the cup, own gallant I must have three more names."

"You may put me down, if you like," said Mr. Guy Greville. "I shall be sure to shoot somebody; but it don't signify."

"And me," said Major Vaughan.

"Thanks. Burgoyne, Torrington, Vaughan, Greville, Fellham Hay—five won't do. I want six at least. Come, gentlemen, who will stand for number six?"

"Why, Trefalden, of course!" exclaimed Vaughan. "Saxon Swiss are born riflemen. Put his name down."

"No, no," said Saxon, hastily. "Not this time."

"But, my dear fellow, you are de la première force, are you not?" asked Castlemoves.

"I used to shoot once," said he; "but I was in practice," said Saxon, with some embarrassment; "but I'd rather not compete now."

The Earl looked surprised, but was too well bred to insist.

"If you won't," said he, "I must find some one who will. Syd Pultney, I shall enter you for my aixth shot, and that settles match number one. Gentlemen, please remember to enter names for the second rifle match; the prize for which will consist of a magnificent pair of elephants' tusks mounted in gold, generously offered by an honorable competitor who declines to compete. I do not mention the honorable competitor's name, because he is a modest young man, and given to blushing. Now, gentlemen, you will please to remember that this is a solemn national occasion, and that I am here upon you!"

And so, rattling on in the gayety of good spirits, the Earl enrolled the second party. Next in order came the long jump of eighteen feet, for Signor Colonna's purse; then the race of one hundred yards, for Lady Castlemove's prize; and, last of all, the one-mile race. This event Castlemoves purely dignified by the name of "the Italian Cup," and entered for by the whole of the athletes.

When the programme was fairly made out Castletowers called Saxon aside, and, taking him familiarly by the arm, led him into the billiard-room, and said:

"Trefalden," said he, "may I ask you a question?"

"Twenty, if you like," replied Saxon.

"No—one will do, if you answer it honestly. Why don't you put in a shot at either of the rifle-matches?"

Saxon looked embarrassed.

"I'd rather not," he said, after a momentary pause.

"But why? You must be a good marksman."

Saxon nodded assent.

"To tell you the truth," said the Earl, "I'm disappointed. I had looked to you for a display of skill, and you have given us none brilliant. I think you should have gone into the field, if only to maintain the honor of the Swiss rifles."

Saxon laughed good-humoredly.

"Do you really want your question answered?" said he.

"Of course."

"Then wait a minute while I fetch my gun." He rose as he spoke, and presently reappeared outside the window, rifle in hand.

"Look there," he said, pointing to the roof of the stables. "A young hawfinch is creeping to it. It was a gift cock, like that which Goethe used to admire, as a child, on the Ober Main. Thor at Frankfort, and just then alighting with the breeze, and flashing in the sunshine like a yellow diamond. The Earl threw up the window and leaned out.

"I should think so," he replied. "I have seen it preen nearly every day of my life ever since I was born."

"How far off is it do you think?"

"Well, I hardly know; perhaps six hundred yards. But you can't hit a thing that blazes like a comet, and is never still for two seconds together."

"It's an ugly bird," said Saxon, bringing his gun to his shoulder. "Do you think he'll look more like a comet if I hit him in the head?"

The words were no sooner out of his lips than he fired. Lord Castlecovers snatched up his hat and bounded down upon the sward.

"You haven't done it!" he exclaimed. "It's impossible!"

"Let us go and see."

They had to go round by the front of the house and across the yards to reach those of the Puddings over which the vane was placed. When they had gone about two-thirds of the distance the Earl suddenly stood still.

There was a small round hole drilled through precisely that part of the cock's head where his eye ought to have been.

At the sight of his friend's dumb amazement Saxon roared with laughter, like a young giant.

"There," said he, "I told you it would be an improvement. And now you see why I wouldn't compete for the cup. We Swiss are always shooting from the time we are old enough to carry a gun, and I didn't want to spoil the sport for the others. It wouldn't have been fair."

TO THE FLAG OF THE FORTY-SEVENTH NEW YORK.

Our flag, we must again! In peace and quiet
Has been thine home, since the last battle-cry
As idle trophy! Done with war and riot,
Thou hangest here, in our City Hall.
Can I believe my eyes? Let's down and see
Of how much glory what a lame conclusion!

That thou, that once amid the sons of thunder
Went shouting on the battle-field before the fight,
Shouldst rest at last amid these sons of plunder—
Our aldermanic children of the night!
The go-burs blue; it feels thy degradation,
Its sky-dome, only equal, I must have there
More names.'

"You may put me down, if you like," said Mr. Guy Greville. "I shall be sure to shoot somebody; but it don't signify."

"And me," said Major Vaughan.

"Thanks. Burgoyne, Torrington, Vaughan, Greville, Fellham Hay—five won't do. I want six at least. Come, gentlemen, who will stand for number six?"

More names. Thou'rt not the dame to shrink around thee
Into murky wreaths that dim thy stripes and stars;
Here in thy prison-house, where Fate hath bound thee,
Thou'rt still the same bright flag of Liberty!
Thou lookest down on placemen and contractors,
Thugs," and each "Boss" that rules the City Hall.

No more thou flauntest in the line of battle;
Thine blighted place is at some civic feast:
Thou hear'st the music, but not thine mate:
'Tis not a martial sound, to say the least.
How like thou art to the more thou emblest of powder
Those fumes are all of abdominable chowder.

Dost thou not dream sometimes amid the laughter—
Amid the music's soft, voluptuous strain—
Of those stern nights, the long day's struggle after,
